HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, November 2, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God always encourage us to believe that the foundation of the Lord standeth sure and hence nothing finally wrong can happen, but O keep us back from presumptuous sins. We hope—we trust—that Thou art carrying forward the better processes of our lives. God is good, and to this infinite truth let our spirits cling. Continue to teach us that a worthy life is founded on pure thought, clean speech, and a resolute sense of right. These and these alone lead to better things. O heavenly Father help us on this way, we beseech Thee. Through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address on the life of the late Senator P. C. KNOX, made by a former Member of this House, Hon. James Francis Burke, before the Allegheny Bar Association.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REREFERENCE OF A BILL.

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill S. 2133, referred to the Committee on the Public Lands, be rereferred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I have talked with the chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, and it is agreeable to him.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the nature of the proposed legislation?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. It puts the jurisdiction of certain bancos or islands acquired from Mexico by treaty on account of the shifting of the river under the jurisdiction of Texas so that they can exercise police power. The Committee on the Public Lands, as I am informed, does not care to handle the legislation, and on account of its growing out of a treaty with Mexico, it is thought proper to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, are these islands inhabited?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I am not advised as to whether all of them are or not. The difficulty about the situation arises from the fact that under the act of 1870 fixing the boundaries of the United States——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold his request until we can make further inquiries?

Mr. CONNALLY of Texas. I will.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a resolution passed regarding the proposed constitutional amendment in reference to sectarian appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Who passed the resolution?

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. It was passed by a church.

Mr. WALSH. Those resolutions are ordinarily dropped in the basket.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. I do not care how it is done so long as it is printed in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. Well, the gentleman has attempted very strenuously to have it printed in the RECORD, and I as strenuously object. [Laughter.]

CALENDAR WEDNESDAY.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the Clerk will call the committees.

When the Committee on Territories was called:

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 8442, known as the Hawaiian rehabilitation bill, be laid on the table, as it is identical with the Senate bill 1881, which has been enacted into law.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I ask whether the Senate bill has been reported to the House?

Mr. CURRY. The Senate bill was reported to the House, referred to the Committee on the Territories, and reported back from that committee, passed the House, and sent to the Senate, and the commission has been appointed.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is referring to the Brazilian exposition matter, for which there was a paid lobby around the House?

Mr. CURRY. No; I am referring to the Hawaiian rehabilitation bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I moved to lay the wrong bill on the table. I move to reconsider the vote whereby the bill H. R. 8442 was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was laid on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill H. R. 7257, the Hawaiian rehabilitation act, be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to lay the bill H. R. 7257 on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CURRY. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 8442, to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1914, as amended.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar. The House will automatically resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. TOWNER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1914, as amended, is further amended by adding at the end of section 2 a proviso to read as follows:

"Provided further, That in order to complete the construction and equipment of the railroad between Seward and Fairbanks, together with necessary sidings, spurs, and lateral branches, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, in addition to all sums heretofore appropriated therefor, the sum of $3,110,210, to be immediately and continuously available until expended."

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 4, strike out the figures "$3,110,210" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$4,000,000."

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I presume this bill ought to pass authorizing either the increased appropriation which the committee recommends or a somewhat similar sum. I say that I presume it ought to pass. Of course, the committee must convince the House that it ought to pass. I have no disposition to say "I told you so" in calling attention to the disappointments that we have suffered relative to the Alaskan Railroad. I doubted the advisability of providing for its construction. More than that, I regretted both at that time and on the occasions since, when we have discussed this question and related questions, the exaggerations that gentlemen have indulged in touching this whole matter. I have no disposition, I never have had any disposition, to minimize the possibilities of Alaska, but I think it is about time that we began and continued to discuss this question of Alaska and the expenditure of public money up there from the standpoint of actual and ascertained facts rather than fairy tales and imagination. There has been more hot air and exaggeration with regard to the alleged value and availability of Alaskan coal fields indulged in from time to time than in regard to any other question that I know of. At one time certain gentlemen undergoing great hardships at the risk of their lives and fortunes, endeavored to develop the coal resources of Alaska. They were treated by the executive branch of the Government and to a certain extent by Congress as though they were malefactors, and in connection with that, gentlemen indulged in prophecies and prognostications in regard to the possibilities of Alaskan coal fields not justified by the known facts and which have been clearly demonstrated as unwarranted exaggerations by the development or the lack of development during the years that have followed.

We started out to build a railroad in Alaska upon the theory that it would speedily develop a very great area, containing very great wealth, and that it would cost us less than $35,000,000. This bill suggests that it will cost at least $56,000,000, $21,000,000 more to do the work than contemplated. The general increase of costs in the country accounts for part of this increase, but the original estimates were too low, as everyone knew, who was conversant with the situation in Alaska and as a number of us insisted at the time the original legislation was before the House. Having spent the sums of money that we have there, I think it is necessary that we shall go on and complete the work, and we shall continue to hope that in the distant, if not in the near, future there may be developments in Alaska that will at least partly justify our expenditures.

Mr. LAZARO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. As I said a moment ago, it strikes me that it would be a particularly wise and sensible thing if in the discussion of this matter at this time we acknowledge the situation as it is and cease to indulge in expectations that can not be realized with regard to this section and its possible future developments.

I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LAZARO. Does not the gentleman believe that we would have been much wiser had we expended this money in the United States to improve our waterways, where we already have the people?

Mr. STAFFORD. And for good roads.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asks a question that opens up a very wide field of discussion and opinion. I believe in the development of inland and minor waterways, not so much because our people use them, because other than the main lines of water travel we have not yet gotten into the habit of using waterways, but I rather approve some expenditure for minor waterways in the hope that we will develop the habit and an inclination on the part of the American people to use such waterways more than they have been disposed to do so in the past.

But I am not complaining, I am not criticising anyone for having voted for the Alaskan Railroad. I do not desire to particularly criticize the undertaking of the project. I rose more particularly to suggest that we get down to earth in the consideration of this enterprise and realize that while Alaska has great resources, yet it has a climate which presents serious difficulties in the way of development, and that its products are not all of them as valuable or as easily and readily and cheaply made available for use as many people imagined they would be. Let us do what we do in the further development of this enterprise after a calm, dispassionate discussion of the situation.

There is no question but that if we had years ago given the hardy pioneers and prospectors who sought to develop the coal fields of Alaska and the oil fields of Alaska an opportunity to continue under the law, we would have had more development in Alaska than we have at this time. We saw fit to check that natural, orderly development under our laws, and to embark on an entirely different, paternalistic program. I hope that it will eventually be somewhat justified, at least, and that the expenditure that we shall make in the building of this railroad will at least give us some return in the opening up and development of that great country; but let us make whatever authorization we do in the full realization of the fact that the enterprise is one surrounded with many difficulties and that we need not and should not expect the very rapid and extraordinary development that some gentlemen have imagined would take place as a result of this expenditure.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill and concurrent resolution of the following titles:

S. 2447. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Pearl River between Meeks Ferry and Grigsbys Ferry and between Madison County, Miss., and Rankin County, Miss.

S. Con. Res. 11. Authorizing the special committee appointed to investigate pay of personnel of Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and so forth, to hold hearings, to employ a stenographer to report the same, and to employ clerical assistants.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate concurrent resolution 14.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a floral wreath to be placed upon the caisson bearing the remains of the unknown soldier which are to lie in State in the rotunda of the Capitol of the United States from November 9 to November 11, 1921, the expense of same to be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, all railroads are supposed to develop a country and to serve the people. The Alaska Railroad will not develop Alaska unless the red tape with which Alaska has been bound up is cut. If the Federal Government continues the long-distance government of Alaska from Washington, instead of cutting the red tape and developing Alaska as it has developed the Western States, through encouraging pioneers to go to Alaska, to own homes and farms and to develop mines and to become wealthy if they can, this railroad will not be of any benefit whatever. If, on the other hand, the policy of government changes and the people are given a chance, it will be of great benefit.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. May I ask the gentleman, Is there any legislation pending now liberalizing the land laws of Alaska so that these resources may be developed by private capital?

Mr. CURRY. There is such a bill now pending before the Committee on the Territories, which will probably be reported from the committee, that will change somewhat the bureaucratic control of Alaska if the House and Senate see fit to pass it and the President to sign it. In 1914 Congress authorized the President of the United States to lay out and construct a railroad in Alaska from the Pacific Ocean to an inland waterway. The President placed the construction of the road in the hands of the Interior Department and appointed a commission to supervise the project. The road was laid out from Seward on the Pacific through Anchorage on Cooks Inlet to Fairbanks on the Tanana River. The length of the road is a fraction less than 468 miles. The entire mileage of the road is approximately 540 miles. That road was to open up two coal fields. Branch lines had been run to those coal fields. The road had been constructed so that the rails are within 40 miles of meeting. At the present time the tracks are being laid at the rate of a mile and a quarter a day. There is a little more than $2,300,000 unexpended of the appropriation of $17,000,000 we last appropriated. With that money the rails will meet. The first $35,000,000 we appropriated in 1914 probably would have completed the road under the conditions existing at that time. The war came along and the cost of labor increased, the cost of material increased, and the cost of transportation increased, including ocean transportation. The majority of the young men employed on that road went to the war. They were drafted; they joined the Army. The result was that the organization had to employ any kind of labor it could get and pay high wages. In 1919 it was found that the $35,000,000 would not complete the road, and the Interior Department asked for an additional appropriation of $17,00,000. At that time I did not think the $17,000,000 would complete the road. I doubted whether the $17,000,000 authorization asked for would build the road and it has not. A careful estimate submitted by the Interior Department shows that $4,000,000 will be needed to complete the road, making the entire cost of the road $56,000,000. We have $52,000,000 invested, and it is either a proposition of scrapping the road or appropriating the $4,000,000 necessary. This $4,000,000 will be to standardize 57 miles of narrow-gauge road with 70-pound rails instead of 40-pound rails, widen the tracks, and heavily ballast it, for the construction of two steel and concrete bridges across two rivers, buying certain rolling stock necessary, and to complete certain terminals. Now, out of the appropriations already made but $37,000,000 have been used for the construction of this road; $11,000,000 was used for the construction of wharves, laying out of towns, for water works and sewers for towns, paving streets, building houses, bringing in power and light, and for the development of two coal mines.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. I will.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The gentleman has stated that it will require $4,000,000 more than has heretofore been authorized to complete this road. May I ask the gentleman when that estimate was submitted to his committee?

Mr. CURRY. The estimate was submitted to the committee about six weeks ago and the estimate was not satisfactory——

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Is the department and is the gentleman satisfied that this additional authorization of $4,000,000 will be entirely sufficient to complete the road?

Mr. CURRY. I am.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The reason I ask the gentleman as to the date of submitting that estimate is this: As the gentleman has stated, when this road was first proposed it was stated then that $35,000,000 would be all that was necessary. Later on, as the gentleman stated, Congress was asked and did authorize $17,000,000 more. Now, at a hearing last December, less than a year ago, Col. Mears, who appeared before a committee of this House, stated that the $52,000,000 of the amount authorized up to that time would not be sufficient, but that it could be completed for $2,000,000 more; in other words, for $54,000,000. Now the department is before the Congress in less than a year stating that it is going to cost $56,000,000, and I was just wondering exactly what that road would cost and when Congress could feel satisfied that it had made a sufficient authorization and appropriation to complete it. There have been four different estimates made up to this time.

Mr. CURRY. The estimate of $4,000,000 was submitted through the Interior Department and was compiled by Col. Mears. The first estimate, as the gentleman is aware, was for $3,110,210. When that estimate was submitted to the committee I looked over it carefully, and I did not believe it contained certain items that ought to be included in the estimate. Thereupon I asked the Secretary of the Interior and the Assistant Secretary to ask for a supplemental estimate that would complete that road from one end to the other and put it in operation. It was understood that some of this estimate might be charged up to maintenance and repairs later on and be carried in the sundry civil bills to be reported from the Appropriations Committee. I stated when I came before the House this time I wanted to have every dollar in the bill that was necessary absolutely to complete this road, and the supplemental estimate covered about $800,000 of items which I suggested were proper.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. If the gentleman will yield further for one further question. On December 18, to be exact, of last year, Col. Mears stated that in his opinion $54,000,000 would complete this road.

Now, what I was anxious to know was, just what has happened, either in the increase of material or cost of labor, since last December to raise this estimate to $56,000,000?

Mr. CURRY. That is a question you should probably ask Col. Mears.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I thought probably the gentleman could inform me.

Mr. CURRY. The gentleman will find a detailed estimate of the cost in the hearings, item by item.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. And Col. Mears submitted an estimate of detailed cost last December which showed $54,000,000?

Mr. CURRY. I was not satisfied that $52,000,000 would complete the road. I questioned him at that time before the committee as to whether or not the road could be completed for that much. Now, I do not claim to be an expert, but I have given considerable attention to the building of the road, as I have been on the committee all the time it has been under consideration and construction. I have reached the conclusion that this $4,000,000 will complete the road, and that no less will complete it, and that the cheapest and best thing the House can do is to authorize this appropriation.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I read in the report that the revenue derived from the uncompleted road during 1921 was practically $339,000. Is that the gross revenue?

Mr. CURRY. That was the gross revenue. Ninety-one thousand dollars of that was passenger fare, but that does not include any charge for freight on the material carried for the construction of the road for the Government. That is income outside of what was done for the construction of the road.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is estimated that when completed the revenues will be practically $1,000,000. Is that gross revenue?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is there any way to arrive at what the probable net revenue will be upon the completion of the road?

Mr. CURRY. My idea is that there will not be a net revenue for a good many years.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is this work done by contract?

Mr. CURRY. It is done by the Army engineers of the Government. Col. Mears is at the head of it and attends to the hiring of the men and ordering and paying for the material.

Mr. BANKHEAD. One other question. In reference to this coal and the mining operations in this property, I have been informed—and I do not know whether the information is accurate or not—that there is some question as to the real commercial value of the coal, as to whether or not it is going to be acceptable for the bunkering of ships, for instance. Does the development show whether or not this coal is superior or inferior coal, so far as it has been exploited?

Mr. CURRY. There are two coal mines that have been opened by the Government, one at Eska, in the Matanuska field, of bituminous coal. About 300,000 tons of that coal have been mined for the use of the railroad. A little of it has been sold by the Government to private citizens in Alaska towns to relieve a coal shortage. It is good coal. At Chickaloon, in the Tanana field, there is a mine opened by the Alaska railroad commission, costing about $202,000. The Government appropriated, in a bill reported from another committee, a million dollars for the use of the Navy in prospecting for and testing coal and for coal mining, and they have been developing that mine and pioneering and investigating as to whether the coal of Alaska is of a quality fit for naval use. This $202,000 mine at Chickaloon was turned over to the Navy Department. They are using that million dollars in experimenting and in investigation. Admiral Coontz told me the other day in his office that this coal was of the highest quality and was good for naval use. The exact amount of coal they were not at that time ready to estimate. However, there are 20,000 square miles of land in Alaska that we know contains commercial coal. How large the bodies are I do not know, nor does anyone else know.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman has said that Admiral Coontz informed him, so far as experimentation shows, that the coal comes up to the requirements for naval coal?

Mr. CURRY. He did. The cost of the coal mined in Alaska, including the opening of the mines and that spent on machinery, has been little less than $5 a ton. When the mine is properly opened it can be mined and delivered at the mouth of the tunnel for about $1.75. I do not think the United States Government should go into the coal-mining business, but I do believe, if it is developed, that it will be found that high-class coal is there in commercial quantity, that can be used on ships; then we ought to adopt a policy that will induce private enterprise to develop the coal mines there and ship the coal out into commerce. I believe it will be done and should be done.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. The report states that the gross revenue from the operation of the road during 1921 was $339,000. What was the cost of operation during that period?

Mr. CURRY. There is nobody on earth can tell. The road was under construction, and the revenue was from freight and passengers going over the road. Ninety per cent of the traffic was Government traffic. That $339,000 was outside of Government traffic.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. It is a fact, is it not, even if completed, your estimate of $1,000,000 net revenue after the road is completed will be a very small percentage of the cost of operation?

Mr. CURRY. No; it will not be a small part of the cost of operation. I think it will probably cost to run the road to capacity $1,500,000 a year. I do not think it will be more than two or three years after completion that the revenue of the road will be four or five million dollars a year.

The million-dollar estimate is for the receipts the first year after the completion of the road. There are very few people up in Alaska at the present time, but we hope that with the completion of this road and the enactment of a bill which will permit people to go to Alaska and develop it this road will be a revenue producer. But I do not want the United States Government to hold that road in perpetuity. It is not the intention of the committee, and it is not the intention of the House, that the Government should run the road any longer than it has to. When the time comes that the road can be leased or sold it should be done. But it depends on the policy adopted by Congress as to that.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Your report states that under the conditions that obtain in Alaska private capital would not be justified in constructing a railroad up there. That being true, how do you hope to be able to lease or to sell it to some private corporation and that that private corporation can operate it at a profit?

Mr. CURRY. I do not expect to see it sold or leased to a private corporation so long as the laws on the statute books prohibit people from going up there to develop the country. I stated in the report that under existing conditions private capital will not build a road. Existing conditions are such that they do not encourage development.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. Yes; I yield.

Mr. HUSTED. What business can this road depend upon except the possibility of coal?

Mr. CURRY. There are two coal fields that alone, when properly opened, would give this road nearly all the business it could do. In addition to that this road taps six very rich mining districts, which have not been developed, but which will be developed when this road can serve them. There are innumerable valleys that are good agricultural land. One man in Alaska this year raised 3,500 bushels of hard northern wheat. There is a good agricultural country in part of Alaska, but it is valueless until a man can get a title to his land. Under existing conditions it is impossible for a man to go up there and file on 160 acres, because it is reserved for mining or coal or oil or forestry or something else, and he can not get a patent.

Mr. HUSTED. As a purely business proposition, does the gentleman think there is a fair prospect that this road could be made to pay as a railroad?

Mr. CURRY. In time, yes; probably in four or five years.

Mr. HUSTED. Is not the chief interest, however, in the development of the country rather than in the prospect of securing any return on the investment in the railroad as such?

Mr. CURRY. The railroad was not laid out and authorized in the first instance as a revenue producer. It was intended as a means to the development of the country. There are 27,000 white people in Alaska, and about 27,000 Indians and Eskimos. During the past 10 years there has been a decrease of about 10,000 in the population. The war has had something to do with that. There is no reason in the world why that Territory should not have a population of several hundred thousand, excepting that the policy of the Government has been to retard pioneering and development.

Mr. HUSTED. Is it not true that our investment there would be practically a dead loss if we do not go ahead and develop this road?

Mr. CURRY. If this road is not completed you will scrap $56,000,000 of American money.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I understand that the report says that the Hon. Scott C. Bone, who was recently appointed governor of Alaska, and who was recently over the constructed portion, states that the railroad will, in his opinion, pay surely and substantially in the ultimate benefits to be derived both by the Territory and the Nation. Was that in a communication to the committee by Gov. Bone?

Mr. CURRY. That was in a personal letter written to me by Gov. Bone.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if there are no further questions, I yield——

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. The gentleman a few minutes ago made reference to a discrepancy between the estimates made last November and the present estimates. I will ask the gentleman if there are not some items inserted in this estimate which were not in the December estimates?

Mr. CURRY. Yes. Eight hundred and some odd thousand dollars is included in the present estimate that was not in the original estimate.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. I was interested in the statement of what Admiral Koontz says about the quantity of coal that had been mined there.

Mr. CURRY. Not the quantity, but the quality.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. That suggests a question. I think the information before the Committee on Naval Affairs has not been of a very satisfactory character as to the quantity of a good quality of coal that can be produced there, and I understand that the good quality of coal of which perhaps Admiral Coontz spoke exists in pockets and not in any great quantity. I wondered what information the gentleman had on that subject.

Mr. CURRY. The only information I have on the subject is such as I have given to the committee. A mine at Chickaloon was opened on this good quality of coal. It was opened at the expense of the railroad commission, at a cost of $202,000. Your committee—the Committee on Naval Affairs—reported out a bill authorizing an appropriation of $1,000,000 to be used by the Navy Department in prospecting for coal and developing coal in Alaska. This mine was turned over to the Navy Department. The coal is of a high-grade quality and fit for naval use. They have not as yet prospected far enough to determine the quantity of coal at that place or in that neighborhood. The quality of the coal is good, and it is understood that the quantity will be. The best coal is not found on the surface. It is down deep, and they are going down on a vein to find out the quantity. The quality is there, and, in my opinion, they will find the quantity; but so far they are not in a position to report as to the quantity of that class of coal at that place.

Mr. EVANS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. Do I understand that this coal must of necessity be lifted, that it is not a self-draining project?

Mr. CURRY. It is on the side of a mountain. You have got to drift in and go after it. The surface coal does not amount to anything, anyway. You have got to go in after it. There are two classes of coal. The surface coal is not good enough to amount to anything. You have got to in farther for the coal.

Mr. EVANS. The gentleman from California spoke of going down rather than drifting in. That is what I was getting at.

Mr. CURRY. I will change that to drifting in.

Mr. EVANS. Coming to a statement that the gentleman made a few moments ago, as I understood him, he said it would be many years before there would be a net income.

Mr. CURRY. Yes; at least four or five years after the road is completed.

Mr. EVANS. That means net operating revenues over operating expenses?

Mr. CURRY. Yes.

Mr. EVANS. It does not mean to include any overhead?

Mr. CURRY. No; certainly not. This is a Government road.

I yield to the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND] 10 minutes. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 20 minutes remaining.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CURRY. I would rather the gentleman would ask his question of the Delegate from Alaska. I have used all but 20 minutes of my time.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I want to occupy the few minutes allotted to me in talking along the line suggested to me by the gentleman from Wyoming. I do not intend to indulge in any flowery descriptions of the Territory or hold out any ideas or possibilities in Alaska beyond what there really are.

The Alaskan Railroad has cost more money than it was originally intended it should cost. The original appropriation was for $35,000,000. If this authorization is passed, it will mean that $56,000,000 altogether will be expended on the railroad.

I bring your attention to the fact that the railroad project came up prior to the European war and that the appropriation was made on the basis of the prices that prevailed at that time on commodities that are used in the building of a railroad, and also on the cost of labor at that time. If you compare the expense of the Alaskan Railroad with expenditures in the States during the war period you will find that the comparison is not at all unfavorable. There was no reckless waste of money on the Alaskan Railroad. I think there were some unwise subprojects gone into. That is my personal opinion. But on the whole the money was fairly well expended, and in the expenditure of all that money there has never been the slightest intimation of graft or profiteering, which, I think, says a great deal for the Alaskan Railroad Commission. If they erred in some respects in regard to the engineering, they did not err in the method of spending the money. There was no money made on contracts in Alaska. The commission gave out contracts to little groups of men and fixed the contract price of certain work at a figure that would just pay them a little better than the wages that were paid for the same work in a general way on the road.

I want to say just a few words in explanation of some of the propaganda that has appeared in the press in the last year in opposition to the Alaskan Railroad. Of course, it is based on the proposition that this is an experiment in Government ownership. Well, it is not Government ownership in the socialistic sense of Government ownership and operation. It is no more Government ownership in that sense than the irrigation projects of the West, the reclamation of arid lands, or even the Panama Canal or the levees of the Mississippi River. These are Government projects to help develop the country, and in the case of Alaska to aid in increasing its population.

Many of these articles in the way of propaganda hold that the Government should have purchased the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad, inasmuch as it was offered to them at the time they went into this project. Well, the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad is a successfully operated project that pays dividends.

That road gives its owners a monopoly of the copper fields in the Copper River Valley. They spent a great deal of money—$20,000,000—on a venture that did not appear the best in the world to practical men, but they tapped one of the richest copper deposits in the world, and they are reaping the results of their enterprise and the chance they took in spending their money. They are fully protected in this valley with their 190 miles of road in operation. It is operating successfully and paying all the time. Now, why should the Government have purchased from private individuals a railroad that they were operating successfully?

The Government went to a section far removed from any individual or private enterprise. They entered into a field that would not warrant private capital in investing in it if they were looking for immediate returns. On the other hand, the Government reserved to itself the coal and oil areas all through this district; and I submit to you that if any corporation had been offered considerations in land or had been given grants of oil and coal lands, through the territory through which this railroad is constructed, private capital would have invested quickly in this railroad.

I have attempted to present here a rough diagram of this railroad. I took it from the diagram that is given in the maps published by the Railroad Commission.

Starting from Seward, on Resurrection Bay, the railroad passes over the Kenai Peninsula, and there is the highest grade in the railroad. For a short distance there is a grade of 2.2 per cent over a ridge in the Kenai Peninsula. The railroad extends from there to Turnagain Arm, on Cook Inlet, and up to the town of Anchorage, located at the head of Cook Inlet. This line here represents a spur to the Chickaloon coal fields of which the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] has spoken. It goes to the Matanuska and Chickaloon deposits of high-grade coal. Passing on the railroad goes through the agricultural valleys of the Matanuska and Susitna Rivers that to-day we know have possibilities of oil deposits. Toward the head of the Matanuska River the railroad is within about 28 miles of Mount McKinley, and there you are on the greatest scenic route in the world.

American tourists swarm to Europe to see the natural scenery of that country, but I want to tell you that if you take Mount Blanc and place the highest peak of the Adirondacks on top of it, you have a mountain that compares in height with Mount McKinley, but not in magnificence or scenic grandeur. I speak of this because I believe the tourist traffic on that railroad is going to be quite an item of income for this project. I believe that Americans will go to see the great natural scenery of Alaska as they may view it from the railroad.

Passing along, it goes up into Broad Pass, and that is now the end of the steel built from the south. The building originally started in the north and built toward the south, and as the gentleman from California says, there are between 30 and 40 miles of unlaid steel, and that open space is very well graded. I have left two gaps in the line on this map; one indicates the lack of a bridge at the Nenana River and the other at Tanana.

At this section at Healy, on the upper Nenana River, there are 9,000,000,000 tons of high-grade lignite coal. There are two mines operated here that ship coal into Fairbanks on the railroad. Fairbanks was a great placer camp, but owing to the increased cost of material and the decline of the high-grade gravels of placer mining they were compelled to abandon their work. One of the great costs of operating placer mines in Alaska was fuel. In the early days they could cut fuel beside the mines at a low cost, and later they had to go over an increased area to obtain it until the cost reached $15 and in some cases $18 a cord. That high cost of wood for fuel made placer mining on many claims impossible. Here is where they are mining the coal, and they send it on the railroad to Nenana River, take it across on horse teams, place it on the train on the other side, and deliver it to the camp in and around Fairbanks. They place it on the cars at $7 a ton, and it is hoped that they can place it in Fairbanks at $10 a ton. That is a great reduction in the cost of fuel to these miners; at least 50 per cent.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Who owns the coal mines?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are leased to any individual who wants to operate them.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. What does the Government get out of it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Fifty cents an acre and 2 cents a ton.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is it proposed to operate the roads by the Government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does the gentleman believe in Government ownership?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In the same way that I believe in the irrigation projects.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The gentleman refers to the Government reclamation projects; is there any bond issued by the people of Alaska? The gentleman understands that the irrigation projects issue bonds.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; we assume that the natural resources will take the place of the bonds.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There are no bonds guaranteeing the payment of the indebtedness.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; but the natural resources of Alaska are reserved to the Government, while in the reclamation projects they are not.

Mr. CURRY. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think the comparison between the reclamation project and the railroad is quite correct. This railroad was authorized originally not as a revenue proposition for the Government, and it was not authorized as a permanent Government ownership. It was authorized by the Federal Government and was built by the Federal Government as a part of the improvement and development of Alaska, the same as in the early days the Republic built roads over the Allegheny Mountains so the people could get into Kentucky and the West. The Government does not own those roads now, and probably in a few years it will not own this road. The road would never have been constructed unless the Government money was appropriated.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield? What road was constructed by the Government over the Allegheny Mountains?

Mr. CURRY. The roads were constructed by the founder of the party that the gentleman from Mississippi belongs to, for the purpose of getting into the West, so that it could be opened up in that way.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. The Government has been repaid for that.

Mr. CURRY. The Government has not been paid a quarter of a dollar; but we hope the Government will be paid for this investment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. By what means?

Mr. CURRY. When the time comes that we can sell the road to advantage.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. HUDSPETH. There is no guaranty that the Government will ever be repaid for this road?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Except that the natural resources, which are in the same position as the land grants to the transcontinental railroad corporations—except that they are reserved to the Government instead of to private interests.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Is it not a fact that they are guaranteed against loss in reclamation projects by bonds of the irrigation districts—50 per cent value of the land?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; but in this case the land belongs to the people.

Mr. CURRY. The Government will gain by the development of that country, the opening up of the agricultural resources, and the populating of a good part of it by our people.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. LOWREY. Mr. Chairman, what is there already in the way of settlement along the route of this road, especially American settlement, and what, if anything, is there in the way of agricultural development?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This valley through which the railroad passes is an agricultural valley, and it is settled for a distance along the road of probably 50 miles.

Mr. LOWREY. From the south end?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They have cleared the farms and are raising vegetables, wheat, and grain and selling it for local consumption. Of course, there is no exportation of farm products from Alaska yet.

Mr. LOWREY. The gentleman means 50 miles from the coast up the road?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; it would be over 100 miles from the coast to where the farming begins in that section of the railroad.

Mr. LOWREY. Then the upper portion of the railroad has no settlement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; the upper part of the road is settled for farming, through the great agricultural valley of the Tanana that it terminates in.

Mr. LOWREY. Is there considerable agricultural development already?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think there is considerable, yes. I would like to explain that. I might also say that if you consider the reindeer herding in connection with agriculture, there are 92,000 reindeer on the plains of Alaska, and although the shipment of those deer will probably be by water, yet there are herds coming up into that section, and they will be contiguous to the railroad in a short time. By the way, that reindeer meat is now being shipped out of Alaska, refrigerated, and is being sold in Minneapolis, St. Paul, and other cities.

Mr. LOWREY. Is that largely an American settlement?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. All American. We have 364 farmers in Alaska, and 200 of them are native Americans. The balance are from the northern European countries—England, Ireland, Scandinavia, and so forth.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Are there not copper mines on the Tanana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not copper mines. They are over farther in this mountain range.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Are there not quartz mines on the Tanana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; several. The quartz mines are closed down, waiting for cheaper fuel and material.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Have these quartz mines any richness, or are they lean?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The quartz mines are very good quartz mines, but the cost of operating is excessive.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. How many dollars to the ton?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know that. I would hesitate to place an estimate on that, but I have a letter here from a miner in the Kantishna country, about 60 miles off the line of the railroad, in which he tells me of a shipment of 700 tons of $200 ore on which he broke even, as he says; he did not make a dollar on 700 tons of $200 ore shipped to the smelter at San Francisco by reason of excessive costs of transportation.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. About what is the cost of the road north of where they fail to connect now? What has it cost the Government?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For the part north?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have never seen that segregated.

Mr. CURRY. The cost of the road with this $4,000,000 will average $80,250 a mile.

Mr. RAKER. Between the gap here and Fairbanks it must be in the neighborhood of 150 miles.

Mr. CURRY. There are 40 miles of unlaid track.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It is about 125 miles from the gap.

Mr. CURRY. The road in Alaska cost $40,000 a mile less to construct than any road in the United States of similar character.

Mr. RAKER. There are 125 miles from Fairbanks to this gap not completed, and without this money to complete that gap all of this money expended north becomes worthless.

Mr. CURRY. That is true.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not want to hold out anything like that. They probably have almost enough money to complete that. There are two immense bridges to build, and one will cost about a million and a half dollars.

Mr. RAKER. You can not take the stuff across that bridge now, unless it be taken over in sleds in the wintertime.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is a temporary wooden bridge there at the present time.

Mr. RAKER. The testimony shows that they take it across in sleds in the wintertime, otherwise in boats.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. You could not build a temporary wooden bridge on that river.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is, according to the hearings, one wooden bridge.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is on the Nenana River.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; and it is intended to replace that with a permanent steel and concrete bridge which will cost $600,000. The temporary bridge will serve the purpose, but it is the proposal of the engineers to erect a permanent steel and concrete bridge.

Mr. RAKER. That is over one place; but what I am stating is that the expenditure of this money on the northern part of the road will be practically useless, so far as the use of the road is concerned, unless the road is completed and the bridge is built.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is true. Gov. Bone, the recently appointed governor of Alaska, delivered an address before the people of Anchorage recently, and I want to read a few words from that address, if I may be permitted to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may be granted 10 minutes more in which to complete this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will not the gentleman from North Carolina demand recognition and then yield some of his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WEAVER], as the minority member of the committee, for one hour.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes additional time to the gentleman from Alaska.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The address is as follows:

You have had a wonderful growth—to me the growth of Anchorage and the building of this railroad has been a matter of sincere and genuine interest. As chairman of the Alaska bureau of the Seattle Chamber of Commerce, I had something to do with securing the appropriation for this railroad. I believed in the project then; I believe in it all the more firmly to-day. We are often asked whether this Government railroad will pay. It will pay, my friends. It may not pay in dollars and cents, in interest on the investment for some years to come, but in benefit to Alaska and in benefit to the country at large it will be as wise an investment as Uncle Sam every made. I was an optimist in the beginning; I am an optimist to-day. I know it will be of incalculable benefit to all of Alaska. It is the first great step in the opening up of Alaska.

Eight years ago when I visited Fairbanks and was shown about the experimental station there and witnessed the initial steps being made in the growing of cereals I was greatly interested. I was skeptical, however, over the likelihood of raising wheat in this Territory. Two months ago I visited Fairbanks again, after approximately eight years, and I saw a demonstrated fact as to what could be done in the way of wheat growing. I visited the homestead of Frank Carr, out from Fairbanks a few miles, who was growing acres of wheat and who last year made a sufficient amount of money out of his farming to become one of the most prosperous men of that community; so prosperous he was enabled to become financially interested in a milling enterprise now under way there. Only a few years ago he was a common laborer; to-day a man of influence in the vicinity of Fairbanks.

Coming back over the road this afternoon I was surprised at the magnificence of the Matanuska and Susitna Valleys. It means much to this coast region, to all the coast region, not only Anchorage, Seward, and Cordova, but as far down the coast as Juneau and Ketchikan, to have a farming country behind us, because after all, my friends, it is agriculture which makes for a permanent population that contributes in largest measure to the prosperity of any State or Territory.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. Have any coal mines been developed on the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, sir. There are deposits of coal, if the gentleman can see the map, in this section called the Bering River field, although I do not think the Copper River & Northwestern Railroad has prospected or exploited it to any extent. There are individuals who have prospected that coal field who are connected with the Copper River Railroad, but they have never taken any coal from it.

Mr. BURTON. What is the development of the harbor of Seward? Has it proven to be a safe harbor?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; they have got a good harbor there.

Mr. BURTON. It is stated there is a bridge to be constructed across the Tanana River; that is that second gap there.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON. How do they do the work of construction there, north of the river, without means of crossing the river?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, well, they take the material down the Yukon and up the Tanana and deposit it on the banks, both ways.

Mr. BURTON. It is brought by water?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURTON. Are the rails laid north of the Tanana River?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. North of the Tanana; yes, sir.

Mr. OLPP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. OLPP. Is that road operable the whole year around, or is it interfered with by snow and ice?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I presume on the summit of the Broad Pass they will have to operate snow plows in the winter, but when you get into the interior there is very little snow. When you get beyond the mountain range you are in an absolutely dry climate free from snowfall of any great amount.

Mr. BRIGGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. BRIGGS. Are there any other mines being operated along this railroad other than those operated by the Government to which reference has been made by the chairman of the committee?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are not operated by the Government; they are operated by private individuals. Two mines at Matanuska are operated by private individuals and in a small way they are shipping to Anchorage, Seward, and surrounding towns.

Mr. BRIGGS. Are there any other interests at this time coming in and developing coal in this section? Is there any other interest manifested by anyone else, any other private enterprise, in the development of coal mines in that section as far as the gentleman knows?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are making application for areas in a speculative way largely, but some are operating.

Mr. BRIGGS. Have these leases they obtain provisions that they shall begin operation within a short time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. What is the time?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not quite sure as to the limit. They have a prospecting provision that gives them four years to prospect in coal areas.

Mr. BRIGGS. Within the area traversed by the railroad has there been any marked or appreciable development since the railroad was built?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not beyond coal and agriculture. Farming has developed, of course. Now, in this section——

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman answer a question, please?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAYTON. How many tons of coal have actually been developed there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To-day they have at Anchorage 20,000 tons of coal piled up for the use of the railroad. Private enterprise is shipping it down for sale in the town of Anchorage. I could not give the tonnage. Now, the governor of Alaska has spoken of the farming interests of the Tanana Valley, and inasmuch as that is one of the important objects that has been held out for the people by this railroad, I want to speak briefly of it.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. Will the gentleman tell us some of the farm products that are raised there?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a report from the Bureau of Agriculture on the farm products in Alaska.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Now, in connection with the farming interests the gentleman has stated that there are now 364 farmers in Alaska?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was at the end of 1919; there are more than that now.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. How many were there according to the previous census of 1910?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not know if that is given, but I think I can find it if the gentleman will give me just a moment.

Mr. CURRY. The population of Alaska decreased a little less than 10,000.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Has the number of farmers decreased during that period?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the number of farmers have increased; the value of the products has increased. The value of the crop in 1919 was $393,902. In 1909, 10 years ago, it was $282,818, so there has been an increase.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Something over $100,000?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In that year Alaska produced about 40,000 bushel of potatoes; to be exact, 37,389. That production has increased considerably in the two years since. Those are valued at $97,556. And other vegetables, cabbages, celery, turnips, and other garden produce was produced, amounting to $60,000. Among those there were 5,000 quarts of strawberries produced; that is, of cultivated berries, and 2,000 quarts of other berries.

Men about Fairbanks have established their farms there in this period of transition from mining to agriculture, just the same as they did in the State of California. I have a letter from the Bureau of Plant Industry in which they tell me 3,000 acres of grain will be grown in Alaska this present year. That 3,000 acres seems ridiculously small; it seems pitifully small to a Member from one of the wheat-growing States, where individuals plant thousands of acres of wheat.

Mr. LARSEN of Georgia. What is the yield to the acre?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. About 15 bushels to the acre, and yet that 3,000 acres of wheat land, together with the additional 3,000 or 4,000 in hay and vegetables, represent the struggle of the pioneer in Alaska just the same as they represented his struggle in all the Western States. The 3,000 acres are represented in the clearing beside his cabin, with a few additional acres of vegetables, and he is living there with his family and becoming attached to the soil. He is a typical American farmer, the pioneer farmer typified for the last 50 years in the steel engraving on our paper currency. He has become a part of the Territory, and he intends to reside there and have his family reside there.

The Fairbanks public school has over 200 pupils, many of them children of the farmers, and the Territory has established an agricultural college and school of mines right here in this agricultural valley, and their children are to be taught the science of agriculture and mining, and the mechanical arts.

The Territory has appropriated in the past $85,000 for building and starting that college, and it will begin its work some time this year. That is the class of citizens. The farming industry seems very small, and it is. There will be no exportation of farm products from Alaska for some time to come. The sale of the products will depend largely on the mining population along the line of the railroad.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I move that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has been exhausted, as the Chair has been informed.

Mr. CURRY. I think I have five minutes left.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the gentleman from North Carolina give me 5 or 10 minutes additional?

Mr. WEAVER. I yield five minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. LAYTON. I would like to ask this question: No matter what the merits of this case may be at this time or in the future, does the gentleman think that at this time we should appropriate this money in view of the financial condition of the country?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, yes.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman thinks so?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. I can not conceive that Congress would refuse to appropriate this money to complete the railroad, and not have it go on transporting the coal and other commodities in order that industry may start up and be stimulated. If the project came up at this time for an appropriation of $35,000,000, I would say that the financial condition of the country would warrant your withholding it.

Mr. LAYTON. This is simply my thought, that at this time, and at least for the next two years, I do not think the Government of the United States ought to appropriate a penny of money for any purpose under the sun that can be done without. [Applause.]

Mr. CURRY. This can not be done without.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. It seems to me the Representative from Maryland is entirely wrong in his position.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman has me mixed up. I am from Delaware.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Anything that spells for itself the employment of American labor, the expenditure and development of the great natural resources of the country, is worthy of investigation and study. [Applause.]

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. ALMON].

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the Committee on the Territories, of which I have the honor to be a member, has investigated this question very thoroughly. There is a unanimous report. The purpose of the bill has been explained in detail by our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY], and I do not consider it really necessary to make any argument in support of this measure. It is a question of whether we will appropriate $4,000,000 now and finish this project or junk $52,000,000 already expended.

Mr. HAYDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. My recollection is that some $17,000,000 was appropriated in addition to the $35,000,000. At the time the $17,000,000 was appropriated $20,000,000 was requested. Was not there a reduction made in the request at that time that we are making up for now?

Mr. ALMON. That is my recollection.

Mr. HAYDEN. So, as a matter of fact, we might have appropriated $20,000,000 at that time and have completed the work?

Mr. ALMON. Yes; if we had done that we would have needed only $1,000,000 at this time.

My observation has been that the United States does not take a backward step, but when it starts in on a thing like this it is going to finish. And I congratulate the Republican Party and this administration in their decision to complete this project, which was commenced during a Democratic administration. I do not know whether it was a wise thing in the beginning or not. I was not a Member of the House in 1914, when this was enacted. But for two or three years the Committee on the Territories has had extensive hearings on measures relating to Alaska, all of which have convinced me that there are wonderful possibilities there, as explicitly stated by our chairman, who is very conversant with Alaska and everything connected with it, and our success in undertaking to develop this great country is dependent, in the first place, on the completion and operation of this railroad.

It is practically completed. Some one asked if it did not mean Government operation of railroads. Of course, it does not mean Government operation of railroads any more than the 50 miles of railroad that we have down here at Panama. I believe that everybody will agree that it was an act of wisdom on the part of this Government to build the Panama Canal, and as a part of that great engineering project connecting the two oceans the building of 50 miles of railroad there was the proper thing to do in connection with it.

Now, if we are going to undertake, since we have acquired Alaska, to do something in real earnest that will increase its population and develop its natural resources, everybody will agree, from our observation and experience when we were developing this country, and especially the western part of the country, that there can be no real development without first building a railroad into the Territory, and everybody who knows anything about Alaska knows that the first thing to do to develop Alaska and to develop its great resources is to build and complete this railroad. When it is completed there is no question in my mind but that the Government can dispose of that railroad and let it be operated by private capital. We may be able to dispose of this railroad when completed for as much as it cost, but if not finished we will lose all we have spent. It has cost more than we expected it would cost, but everything that was constructed during the war cost more than during peace times. As explained by the chairman, labor was high and scarce, and material was high, and it cost more than anyone expected. But that is no reason and no argument why we should stop and turn back now and not authorize the appropriation of $4,000,000 in order to save $52,000,000 that has already been expended.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ALMON. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I notice that in the original act there is this expression in section 2, to which this act is a proviso, that—

The cost of the work authorized by this act shall not exceed $35,000,000, and in executing the authority granted by this act the President shall not expend or obligate the United States to expend more than that sum.

Now, I am not objecting to its giving more, but the question I wanted to ask the gentleman is this, that since you propose an amendment here by way of a proviso, ought you not also to amend the limitation on the President's authority? You are appropriating money here to him, and yet by the first part of the section which you are amending you say, "You can not spend it."

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Was not that changed at the time the last appropriation was made?

Mr. ALMON. It does not occur to me that that is important.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They had no trouble in expending the additional $17,000,000.

Mr. CURRY. I wish to say to the gentleman from Indiana that that was the original authorization, and then they came to Congress for $17,000,000 additional, which was appropriated, and now they are coming for more.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I am talking about the original phraseology. You do not change the law or repeal it, but add a proviso. In the first part of the original bill is this provision to the effect that the President can not expend the money you appropriate.

Mr. CURRY. When you authorize the expenditure of more money, it implies the repeal of the original provision, and it has been so construed by the department. Seventeen million dollars has been expended in addition to the original $35,000,000.

Mr. ALMON. I do not think there is anything in the point made by my distinguished friend from Indiana. This is an authorization for an additional sum of $4,000,000.

I do not think there is a man in this House who would agree and decide that we ought to junk $52,000,000 when, by spending $4,000,000, and finally sell it for what it cost, we make it possible that the original intention shall be carried out and at the same time develop Alaska, as was the purpose and intention of the original act in 1914. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time Judge ALMON used?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 27 minutes.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I dislike very much to disagree with the members of the Committee on Territories who have reported out this bill, because I have the very highest regard for all of them personally. However, I am unable to agree with them in their judgment upon this proposition.

I thought at the time we entered upon this proposition that it was a blunder, as did many others, and in my opinion the subsequent events have fully demonstrated that it was a blunder. In the light of developments, if this were presented to the Congress as an original proposition, to appropriate $56,000,000 for this railroad, you could not muster a corporal's guard in support of it. In fact, the chief argument presented by those favoring it is that, having spent $52,000,000 upon the project, it is up to us to spend $4,000,000 more.

Now, I am opposed to even doing that, because I think it is sending good money after bad. I do not believe that it is a feasible proposition, even according to the admissions of those favoring this project. For instance, when it was originally advocated it was insisted that it was very important from a naval standpoint, that coal could be mined and would be mined from Alaska, to be used by our fleet upon the Pacific.

However, this road was partially constructed and purchased in 1914, at the time of the original appropriation, and it has been in course of construction ever since, and yet I think the proponents of the measure will admit that not one pound of coal has been mined from Alaska and used by the Navy except for experimental purposes. It has been reported upon reliable authority from time to time that the experiments have shown that the Alaskan coal was not suitable for naval purposes. I know that some reports to that effect have been made.

Furthermore, before we have completed the construction of this railroad the Navy has practically abandoned the use of coal and is now using oil, and all the new ships now being constructed are being prepared for the use of oil for fuel.

We were told that there were great agricultural possibilities in Alaska, and we are still told of those possibilities, but it occurs to me that the possibilities that were pictured in such glowing terms then are no longer even possibilities but have dwindled into improbabilities. It is stated by the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND] that there are now 364 farmers in all Alaska.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the gentleman will allow me to correct him, that was at the end of 1919.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. That was in 1919, and I presume that there must be still fewer farmers now, because the population in Alaska is diminishing according to the census reports. I think that the census showed that there were about as many farmers in Alaska in 1910 as there are now. These 364 farmers produced, in 1919, products to the value of $339,000, I believe, which was an increase of something like $100,000 over the annual production 10 years previously. In other words, after expending $52,000,000 in order to develop these wonderful agricultural possibilities, they have performed the marvelous feat of producing $339,000 worth in one year in all of Alaska. What a paradise it must be! Besides, have we not got plenty of good farm lands in the United States without spending millions of dollars of the people's money in a futile effort to foster farming in a land where the soil is frozen 15 or 20 feet deep the year round, except that a few inches of the surface thaws out for a brief period during the summer?

Not only is it a fact that the population of Alaska is dwindling, but the gold production has diminished to almost nothing. The salmon fisheries are decreasing to such an extent that not only are bills pending, introduced by the gentleman from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND] and others, for the protection of the salmon industry, but even the packers themselves appeared before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries the other day and said that unless something was done to protect them against themselves the salmon fisheries would soon be gone. We know that the seal fisheries have greatly diminished.

But suppose all these possibilities in minerals and otherwise are there as pictured by the proponents of this measure; is it not proper to preserve and conserve some of our natural resources for posterity? For instance, take coal. We have enough coal within the confines of the United States to last our citizenship for an indefinite period of time. Why not preserve and conserve some of those resources in Alaska until they can be developed at a profit instead of a loss?

It is admitted that this road is being operated at a loss. For instance, this very report shows that in 1921 the total gross revenue was $339,000. We were unable to ascertain from the author of the bill what the cost of operation was in producing this commercial service, but it is stated in a recent report of the Alaskan Engineering Commission, quoted in the committee report on this bill, that—

> Large sums have been expended in coal mining and railroad operation and maintenance of completed sections in excess of the revenue received.

It is further claimed as one of the possibilities that when this road is completed the revenue will amount to $1,000,000 a year. Just think of it; a road 539 miles long producing an annual revenue of $1,000,000! It does not take a statistical expert to know that that would not pay one-fifth of the cost of operation. And who will pay the balance? Why, these gentlemen will later be coming back here for appropriations to pay the deficits in operation after we have spent $56,000,000 for the construction of the road. It is an appropriation sink hole, and it will continue to be, in the light of the situation as it has developed. That is what we are up against, and that is the reason I am opposed to this appropriation.

It is insisted by the chairman that the revenue from the road will increase. What right have we to expect that?

The committee report submitted by the author of this bill, the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY], very correctly states that—

> Under the conditions that pertain in Alaska private capital would not be justified in constructing a railroad.

The said report also quotes from a recent report of the Alaskan Engineering Commission as follows:

> The railroad has been constructed in a wilderness where every agency had to be developed and carried along with the actual road construction. Ocean docks, towns and camps, railroad shops, supply terminals, and even the wagon roads over which to haul the supplies had to be constructed as a necessary part of the plan.

The committee report further states that—

> The railroad taps two coal fields, six mining districts, and a number of valleys having agricultural possibilities.

In view of their zeal and their highly colored description of the "possibilities," we may fairly assume that the proponents of this bill have at least stated their case as favorably as the facts would justify.

In view of the fact that innumerable railroads in the United States, operating through thickly populated and productive territory, have been unable to operate at a profit, many have gone into the hands of receivers, and many even abandoned, how can it be reasonably expected that this Alaskan railroad, constructed through an undeveloped wilderness, in a territory whose population and industries are diminishing, can be made self-sustaining? It is admitted by the proponents of the measure that this railroad will necessarily be operated at a loss for many years; but they insist that it will develop the territory and that substantial benefits will ultimately be derived from its operation. Benefits to whom? Certainly not to the Government or the taxpayers of the United States who pay for the construction of this railroad and who annually will be called upon to make an appropriation to cover the deficits in operation. Even if the Government coal lands are developed, the Government leases such lands on a royalty of 2 cents per bushel, which would amount to a mere bagatelle upon the largest amount of coal that the wildest dreamer hopes will be mined from those fields for a long time to come, even granting that such coal is marketable.

It is insisted by those favoring this bill that it is not intended that the Government shall indefinitely own and operate this road, but that it would be sold or leased. They have already admitted themselves out of court on this proposition. No private corporation will be foolish enough to purchase or lease a railroad that can only be operated at a substantial loss. The time may possibly come in the distant future, after the natural resources in this country have become sufficiently depleted and exhausted, when it will be feasible and profitable to develop and mine whatever mineral resources exist in Alaska, but the time has not arrived. When it does arrive, private capital can be depended upon to develop such resources. In the meantime it is folly for this Government to continue such an expensive and unprofitable venture as is involved in this Alaskan railroad scheme. The benefits of such will inure only to the Guggenheims and other interests who desire to exploit that territory at Federal expense. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WEAVER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, this is but another illustration of how sometimes Congress authorizes what may be a very doubtful enterprise upon positive estimates and assurances that its cost will not exceed a certain amount, and then later the Congress is asked to appropriate a very much larger amount on the plea that it is necessary to complete the work.

I voted against the original proposition to build this Alaskan railroad in 1914. I did so because I felt that it was not wise for the Government to undertake in this day the building of a railroad in Alaska or anywhere else, and that if the glowing assurances and statements which were made by those who advocated the proposition at that time were even half true, it would be very easy to secure private capital to build this railroad if given the proper encouragement. At that time it was stated that it would cost not exceeding $35,000,000, although those opposing it insisted that it would cost more. But those who advocated the building of this road and the appropriation of the $35,000,000 were positive in their statement that under no circumstances would it cost more than that amount.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Was not that statement made before the war, and before the great increase in the cost of labor and material?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. That is true.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The statements were made in good faith, and undoubtedly would have been realized if conditions had not so radically changed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not question the good faith of those who made the statements, and, of course, it is perfectly apparent that the cost of material and labor has increased greatly since those statements were made. But the gentleman must remember that in addition to the $35,000,000 Congress has appropriated $17,000,000 more, nearly a 50 per cent increase, and now we are called upon to make an additional authorization of $4,000,000.

While I opposed the original proposition, I am frank to say to you that if I felt sure that those who submit these estimates now were correct in their statements, and that they would not come before Congress for an additional amount, I would be inclined to vote for this proposition on the theory that we have spent $52,000,000, and that having done so we should expend the $4,000,000 additional to complete the road; but judging from our past experience with reference to the estimates that have come from the Interior Department with regard to the building of this road, I am not at all satisfied that we have now had the last word in so far as additional appropriations are concerned.

Mr. TILSON. Assuming that we had completed the road entirely, then what would the gentleman propose to do with it? Does he suppose that anybody would take the railroad as a gift and agree to operate it, or, on the other hand, does he think that, regardless of the cost and the overhead charges, the Government could operate the road and make it pay running expenses?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I think it is quite evident to everyone who has heard the debate this morning that this road will never under any circumstances, however favorable they may be, pay anything like the cost of running expenses.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can not we wish it onto Henry Ford? [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Possibly Mr. Ford could run it cheaper than anybody else, judging from his recent experience in the operation of a railroad. Now, the first estimate was $35,000,000. Later on they came to Congress and said they must have $17,000,000 more, and they could complete the road with that amount. Last December Col. Mears, in charge of construction of this road, stated to the Committee on Appropriations that it would require $2,000,000 more to build the road, or, in other words, that the entire cost would be $54,000,000. We are now told, in less than a year, that $54,000,000 will not complete it, but $56,000,000 will be necessary. The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] a few moments ago said that the original estimate for this additional authorization was $3,110,210, but later on, in less than one month, it was amended, making it $4,000,000.

In the hearing before the Appropriations Committee on December 18, 1920, Col. Mears was asked these questions and made the following replies:

The CHAIRMAN. So you will not be able to complete the project within the limit of cost of $52,000,000?

Col. MEARS. No, sir; you can not do it; you can not operate this railroad for that length of time and build these other things that have been inserted in the estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. How much is going to be required in addition to the authorized limit of cost?

Col. MEARS. We are going to overrun on this basis to the extent of about $2,000,000.

Mr. BYRNS. When was this road first commenced?

Col. MEARS. The construction commenced in 1915.

Mr. BYRNS. And you think it will be completed in the summer of 1922?

Col. MEARS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYRNS. As I understand it, since it was first projected there has been no change in the plan, so far as the road itself is concerned or so far as the length of the road or route is concerned?

Col. MEARS. There has been no material change, except that the Government purchased this Tanana Valley Railroad and has been operating it. That was not considered in the original authorization.

Mr. BYRNS. What did that cost?

Col. MEARS. The purchase price was $300,000.

Mr. BYRNS. As I remember it, the first authorization was $35,000,000?

Col. MEARS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BYRNS. And that authorization was increased two or three years ago to $52,000,000. You think now that it will cost in the neighborhood of $55,000,000 to complete it?

Col. MEARS. About that; yes, sir.

Mr. BYRNS. Is this 66⅔ per cent increase over the original estimate due entirely to increased cost of labor and materials or is it due to a mistake made in the first instance by those who submitted the estimates?

Col. MEARS. It was probably due to both. The first estimates made were too low, although they were fair estimates at that time. When we started in at Anchorage, in 1915, we employed labor at $3 per day. That section was a wilderness. There was nothing whatsoever there. We landed on the shore and graded out 30 miles of road before the 1st of October, and we had experienced railroad-station men at our beck and call. That section of the line was graded within the original estimate. From then on, however, we have been raising wages steadily. We have raised them from $3 to $5 per day, and the price of food supplies has doubled since that first summer's work. At that time we paid $30 per ton for steel rail, and we had a freight rate from the Alaska Steamship Co. of $6 per ton. Now we have to pay $47 per ton for the rail and $13 for the transportation.

We are now told that the road will not be completed until 1923. In view of this uncertainty on the part of those in charge of the construction of this road, I think Congress ought to wait until it can receive definite and final assurances before making an additional authorization. The road ought never to have been undertaken in the first place.

But I repeat if I felt sure that the road could be completed for $4,000,000, I would be inclined to vote for it because of the past expenditures, but I think on account of the condition of the Treasury and the burdens already imposed on the taxpayers we ought to wait until the Interior Department knows what it can do and gives us a final and certain estimate, so that we may at least know just what will be the further demands on the Treasury. [Applause.]

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 28 minutes.

Mr. WEAVER. Will the Chair let me know when I have occupied 10 minutes? Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I wish to take a few minutes to state how this matter appears to me. I am a member of the Committee on the Territories, and for some two or three years I have been greatly interested in this great Territory of Alaska. I do not believe there is any Member of the House who would vote for this $56,000,000 now to construct a road into Alaska with the present condition of our finances, but I do believe, gentlemen of the House, most sincerely that it would be an unwise thing for us to refuse to vote a sufficient appropriation to complete the road which we have already undertaken into that great Territory. [Applause.]

Why, Mr. Chairman, talk about Government ownership? The gentleman from Alabama has called attention to the fact that now the Government owns a road and operates it in Panama 50 miles in length. We do not consider that Government ownership. I might go back to the years prior to the Civil War and point to the time when my own State of North Carolina, in order to develop the great, sparsely settled sections of that State, voted to issue bonds, and built throughout the length and breadth of North Carolina railroads in which she to-day owns the stock—the North Carolina Railroad, between Charlotte and Goldsboro, was built by the State. The Western North Carolina Railroad was built by the State and opened up a section in which I live in the mountain regions. That stock in the North Carolina Railroad to-day is among the most valuable of her assets, but she does not operate the roads. This road is leased now for a period of 99 years to the Southern Railroad, upon which the State receives a handsome return; at least 7 per cent on its stock in this railroad.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. DAVIS] seems to have an idea like that expressed by Senator Vance in regard to Alaska. In making a political speech Senator Vance was telling what the Democratic Party had done and what the Republican Party had done. He pointed to the fact that all the territory acquired by the United States had been acquired under Democratic administrations—the great Louisiana Purchase, the Territory of Texas, and other great areas of the West. He said that the only thing the Republican Party had ever acquired was Alaska, where they had nine months of winter and three months of very cold weather. My friends, I feel that Providence, in her beneficent way, has kept Alaska for the needs of our civilization, and in this vast, frozen region has stored up millions of tons of coal and a vast amount of metals until the time when civilization will need these things. We are not building this road because of what it is to-day, but we are looking to the future, when your children and my children will need these vast resources. I was reading an article the other day, I think in the World's Work, and it is worth reading, showing how the human race sprung into existence in the Tropics, and how the struggle and advancement of civilization has always gone northward; that the human race had not grown strong, had not produced the highest form of civilization in the Tropics, but that civilization had steadily gone north.

So, my friends, we have this great Territory up there to which to look. You gentlemen do not conceive the vast extent of Alaska. Not long ago, just across the line in the British territory on the Mackenzie River, they struck a vast field of oil, and if you will notice on the map, on the farther coast of Alaska, away up beyond where this railroad reaches, in the bleak sands of the Arctic, our geologists have found signs of oil, which some day may help to run our industries and supply our civilization.

My friends, there are no farmers there, but that country raises barley, oats, potatoes, and the potentialities are there. They say the population has decreased. There is one thing I would like to have you think about. Prior to the war gold mining was extensive, and did you ever think that the only commodity that did not increase in price during the war was gold? That did not increase in price. Any miner taking out so many grains of gold found that everything else had gone up, but gold had not. These miners went off to the war. Col. Mears, at the head of construction of the road, himself felt the call of his country to go to war. He went and stayed, and now when the war is over he has come back there to help to complete this railroad.

I hope, and I say this to my Democratic friends, that we will go forward with this work which we began in 1914 under a Democratic administration, though I do not think there is any politics in this matter, and that we will complete it and trust to the future, and I believe we will not be disappointed.

Mr. CHALMERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. CHALMERS. Has the committee made any definite estimate as to what the annual deficit will be, if this road is completed, because of the operation of the road?

Mr. WEAVER. I do not think it has. It is almost impossible to tell, but our idea is that after a few years it will be entirely self-supporting.

Mr. ROACH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. The gentleman is a member of the committee?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. ROACH. It has been stated that a considerable amount of appropriations previously made to complete this railroad has been used for purposes other than the construction of the railroad. I expect to vote for the bill, for it seems to be the practical and sensible thing to do, but can the gentleman give us any assurance that this $4,000,000 will not be diverted; that it will be used to complete the construction of the road?

Mr. WEAVER. I think I can give the gentleman that assurance. About $37,000,000 of the $52,000,000 has been expended in actual construction, but if the gentleman will consider the situation he will see that they had to build docks and everything and had to carry the enterprise forward with them. It was not like building a road through a settled country where they had transportation facilities to get their materials there. They had to go into the mines and open them up in order to get coal to operate with and to lay out towns.

Mr. ROACH. I can see that.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I think I can guarantee the gentleman from Missouri that the model-town idea and the great uplift in connection with railroad building in Alaska is absolutely over.

Mr. WEAVER. I was about to suggest that that idea had been abandoned.

Mr. ROACH. I am very glad to hear it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The report shows that there is still available on existing appropriations $2,281,000 plus, and the committee is seeking in addition to that $4,000,000. How long is it estimated to take to complete the actual construction of the railroad?

Mr. WEAVER. They expect, from the statements made before the committee a few days ago, to complete it about December, 1923. There would be a considerable opportunity, if this appropriation is given at the present time, to meet any emergency that may arise in that connection before the completion of the road.

I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that this is a mere authorization. Of course, the appropriation will have to be made by the Appropriations Committee later. We are merely asking you to authorize this appropriation to be made when necessary.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WEAVER. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The gentleman is familiar with the construction, survey, and the building of the Copper River Railroad?

Mr. WEAVER. I can not say that I am.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Then, there is no use of asking the gentleman the question that I had in mind.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I shall need but two minutes to discuss the Alaska Railroad situation from the standpoint of a man who lives out in the Pacific Northwest. To state the situation in a rough way, we are, so far as the railroad situation is concerned, somewhat in the position of the gentleman who is in a poker game. We are in for $52,000,000 now, and it is a little too early to go home. We had better chance another $4,000,000. We think that perhaps $4,000,000 will carry us along and complete the road, connect it up, and get it to operating fully. That amount of money will not be all appropriated at this time, even if this bill authorizing it is passed. It will be appropriated as needed. By the time we have the Alaska Railroad completed and going we earnestly hope that Congress in its wisdom will do something for us in the way of laws that will take the dead hand off Alaska and relieve us of some of the provisions of these leasing laws, by which no capital can go into Alaska with any hope of making a reasonable profit on any return. That is what is the matter with Alaska.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Whom does the gentleman expect to operate the railroad?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I think that road will be operated for some time as a developer for Alaska, and then when we permit capital to go in there and make the wheels go around we can sell the railroad.

Mr. LAYTON. Does the gentleman advocate the revival of the Cunningham claims?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, no; but the property under them will be dead for a thousand years under the dog-in-the-manger policy now pursued.

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. I understand that the Government leases the coal mines on a royalty of 2 cents a ton.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I am not talking about the coal mines and coal leases particularly. I am talking about the general mining development of Alaska and, in fact, homesteading, water power, prospecting, and all development by which a new country is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 215. Joint resolution to declare November 11, 1921, a legal public holiday.

RAILROADS IN THE TERRITORY OF ALASKA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER].

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I think the whole subject here could be summed up in one statement. It is a business proposition. With business men behind it who have expended $52,000,000, requiring $4,000,000 to complete the project, would any level-headed business man in America with a proper project abandon it or fail to carry it to a successful completion because of that additional expenditure of $4,000,000? Everyone would say no to that question. This is a Government project, in the same position for the purpose of developing its property, which it has reserved by way of land and minerals, agriculture, fish, water power, and everything that pertains to the country. The question of the public ownership of this road is not involved. If it is involved later, whether the Government should maintain it and run it, clearly the administration then in power, no matter of what political faith, will have men of capacity and ability to run this railroad at a reasonable profit to the Government when once constructed.

We have had a great deal of testimony upon this subject, many parties coming from Alaska, and from others interested in respect to these developments.

All ought to know the prior history of the railroads and the discussion regarding the coal development of Alaska. When it was claimed that a few private individuals had filed upon and would eventually absorb the coal lands of Alaska the Committee on Public Lands heard for weeks testimony pro and con upon that question, particularly on the bill which finally became a law regarding the coal lands of Alaska, and private claims were practically all, if not all, eliminated, and the Government retained its ownership in the coal lands of Alaska. Upon the hearings of that bill, as well as the presentation to the House, the record shows that there was enough coal in Alaska to supply the civilized world for a thousand years, one field of 12,000,000 acres and another field of some 5,000,000 acres, and in addition to that in that Territory were reserved two large fields, one of some seven thousand and odd acres that the Government might have control of and that would never be sold, and another field of some five thousand and odd acres.

Relative to the water power, we provided for that. Following that came this legislation relative to the construction of the Alaskan railroad for the purpose of this development, and the House and the Senate and the country applauded the legislation relative to the coal lands. Then, again, there was legislation relative to the oil lands, and next the legislation relative to the water power, and then the railroads, and there has been some restriction regarding the rules and regulations under that legislation as to the development of Alaska. Men who have gone into the subject believe that Congress was wise in its legislation, but that it has not been fully carried out regarding its lands, but if it will be with the completion of this road, the fondest hopes and greatest desire of all Alaskan people and those in the West will be consummated and that wonderful territory will be opened up for the American people and the people of Alaska, so that we can retain and have a real benefit for the people there. So that there are no individuals, no corporations, no combinations that have a grasp on Alaska, and you ought to be willing and ready and satisfied, after having driven out corporate control in Alaska to the end that greater holdings might not be consummated there as has been in the States before; as, I say, we ought to be willing now at least to act not only properly but with sufficient speed to the end that what we have started might be consummated. That we might be able to say to the American people that we have now eliminated the question of trust control in Alaska, that we are willing to give those who stay there an opportunity to develop and assist in developing that land, and all those in America who desire to go and pioneer in that country ought to be given an opportunity to go, and be given it to that very end.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have I?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. RAKER. To be consistent, I am going to yield, while the temptation is great to go on, to my friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARKE], that four minutes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I thank the gentleman for the compliment. Mr. Chairman, we live in an age of casuistry and sophistry, therefore as an aftermath of the war everybody is trying to lean upon the Government, and this is one of those leaning propositions. When men come to you and tell you of the great mineral resources of Alaska I say that I know something of the truth of their assertion. It is indeed rich in all the mineral resources, coal, copper, and gold, and if you will give capital a fair and free hand it needs no assistance from the Government to go in there and develop those propositions; and when you men come along to me and tell me, as fellow Members of Congress, that you need $4,000,000 more to make up the "missing link" there, God help us. We have been hunting for the "missing link" since the evangel of civilization came on earth. Nobody has found it, whether in the Democratic or the Republican Party. Sometimes we have had it in one guise and sometimes in another, and we have had promises always in the sophistry of Uncle Sam's putting up a dollar to put a thing "through" that never led us anywhere except to socialism and communism. You men to-day are wandering around and the great evangels of that principle are wondering where you are going to end up. But I will tell you this: Some of you who vote for these propositions that are socialistic and communistic to wring another dollar from Uncle Sam and add other dollars to our tax burdens are going to have a long vacation, and some of us farmer boys will come back and laugh at you. [Applause.]

East of the range of mountains that stretches out through the great Alaskan Territory there is nothing but gold and minerals, and those propositions private individuals and private enterprise are willing to develop. Through the Bering and Matanuska coal fields, rich as they are, squatted on under a great conspiracy of master minds to corral the natural resources of Alaska, you ask that "Uncle Sam" should build a railroad, at an added cost of $4,000,000, to give somebody a chance to get rich on. Your money and my money is being spent under this sophistry, and you are trying to give somebody a chance to enrich himself, or themselves, at the expense of Uncle Sam, when there are already real obligations outstanding.

Now, I am just one of those simple-minded farmers who admits I am willing to spend a few dollars—mighty few—but I am going to first spend it where there is a legal and moral obligation, now outstanding, to spend it; I am going to spend it for honest citizens who are not in conspiracy to get something out of Uncle Sam for nothing, but who are in a conspiracy, as farmers, to develop something within their own circles and within their own spheres, and that something is herds freed of tuberculosis and pure milk for all. The great farming constituency, of which I am a simple member, is to-day awaiting for the Government to complete its contract with them for herds condemned and partially or wholly destroyed because of tuberculosis, and awaiting the needed money to rebuild their herds. We have heard the great cry for the eradication of tuberculosis from our herds of dairy cattle. We have had our herds tested by the State of New York, and by the Federal Government, and tested by every known device. We have been wanting to eradicate tuberculosis from our herds and are willing to "clean house," and yet to-day with the present appropriation exhausted we find our farmers' organizations and our farmers without the means of "cleaning up" and rebuilding their herds, and the Government owing many farmers money they badly need. And yet you men, listening to the voice of sophistry and casuistry, say to spend $4,000,000 of Uncle Sam's money for everything except the farming industry and moral and legal obligations already assumed, which industry, after all, is the great fundamental industry of our country. It seems to me, gentlemen, if you listen to the voice of reason, you will hesitate for a long time before doing so.

Who is going to operate this railroad? Uncle Sam has dipped his fingers into this Government operation of railroads and had his fingers burned, rates high, operation rotten; and I am not going to vote for an appropriation of $4,000,000 for this railroad proposition, or to ratify it, until you first vote to meet your moral and legal obligations, honestly entered into and faithfully fulfilled, to the farmers whose herds have been killed in the interest of health and the general public.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent Mr. CLARKE of New York, Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee, Mr. ALMON, and Mr. RAKER were granted leave to extend their remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The bill was read.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Committee amendment: On page 2, line 4, strike out the figures "$3,110,210" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$4,000,000."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the amendment. I opposed this appropriation most vigorously some seven years ago, and I will read what I said at that time:

What Alaska needs is a policy, not an appropriation; judicious land and mineral laws which shall be fair to the people of the Territory and shall subserve the interests of the whole United States, and not a railroad built at Government expense.

The objections to this enterprise were, in the first place, the undesirability of a Government undertaking of this nature, the general arguments against Government ownership and management of railroads, and that in a region where the resources were unexplored and existing policies prevented them from being made available. At the time of the discussion in 1914 there was a serious question as to the quality and quantity of the coal in Alaska. I am surprised to find that the same uncertainty still exists. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] has mentioned that in the testimony before the Committee on Naval Affairs there may not have been serious doubt as to the quality but there were indications that the quantity would be lacking, and that the mines existed only in pockets. There is nothing as an investment of capital more deceptive than a coal mine, and I do not feel satisfied to this day that the resources of coal which have been claimed for that area exist there.

But the agitation for the appropriation in 1914 was very strong. Many times it has happened that when the relative claims of the Old Flag and the appropriation are being considered, the Old Flag has the sentiment, and the appropriation the practical support. And thus this amount of $35,000,000 was appropriated in 1914 and later an additional $17,000,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there is no sufficient answer to the argument made here. We have appropriated $52,000,000, and our investment is lost unless we appropriate the remaining $4,000,000 or $3,000,000 required for completion. I suppose we must do it, but I think this House will vote that additional amount with a decided interrogation point as to whether the $4,000,000 will be sufficient. In conclusion, I trust the committee will not let this project pass without consideration of the necessity of far more serious discussion of a project of this kind before we enter upon it. I believed it was a blunder in 1914; I believe now it was a blunder. And I hope that while we are compelled to make this appropriation it will be a lesson to us in the future that will cause us to pause before we enter upon any such enterprise.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I have not had the advantage of general debate, but nobody needs the illuminating speech of my friend, the gentleman from California, to advise him of the inadvisability of this appropriation. I remember in 1914, when this child was born, they told us it could be brought forth, and educated, and brought to manhood, and to a self-sustaining estate for $35,000,000. At that time we had a wonderful picture of the great resources of Alaska; that all we had to do was to tap them with a Government-owned railroad, and they would be made a wonderful thing, and that the population would increase, and it would be a great blessing to this country; that it was not a local bill at all, but a national enterprise. Well, the original appropriation was exceeded. I understand they spent about $52,000,000. Now you want $4,000,000 more. I note the report of the committee quotes the chairman of the Alaskan Engineering Commission in a recent report, as follows:

The railroad is being constructed in a wilderness.

That tells the whole tale. An American Congress, out of the taxpayers' money, is building a railroad in a wilderness. There is no reason why you should build a railroad in a wilderness in Alaska any more than you should build a railroad in any State of the Union. And, gentleman, you could take $4,000,000 and go to the rescue of some of the short-line railroads of the country and save them. Two of them in my State are threatened with sale and will be sold this month, one of them in my district, that would be worth more and would be of more service to the people than will the railroad in Alaska for 50 years. [Applause.]

Suppose I had come before the Appropriations Committee and said, "Give me $4,000,000 and save the Memphis, Dallas & Gulf Railroad, that traverses a great country, a country so sparsely settled now that under present economic conditions it can not support itself, and it will only need aid for a short while. That country is rapidly developing and it will be a self-sustaining proposition pretty soon, and this appropriation will develop that great country down there," what would you have said? You would have said, "You socialistic crank, why, you come in here and want us to go to building railroads in each congressional district."

Gentlemen, that is what this proposition is. If it is right to build and maintain a railroad in Alaska, then every argument that can be offered for it can be offered in behalf of building little railroads throughout these United States, because we all know that under the present conditions there will be no new railroads built for years, and many territories will be held back in the outlying districts of the United States, and all we need is the tapping of a railroad system. There are two in my State which are but typical of other short-line railroads in other parts of the Union that are feeders of the trunk lines. Large towns, some of them modern, are left off the railroads because of the failure of these little railroads.

Now, do you propose to aid them out of the Federal Treasury? The answer is, "Oh, no; that is socialism. That is paternalism. You people must support them yourselves." But when you go to that wilderness in the frozen north of Alaska, where the chief occupation of the inhabitants is drawing pay from the Government, then it becomes a beautiful dream; it is necessary to do it to conserve the public welfare and develop resources of a great Nation. But that is all bunk, gentlemen, pure and simple; socialistic bunk, gone to seed. That is all that it is. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I oppose the gentleman's motion. I am surprised at my distinguished friend from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], who talks about socialistic principles, and so forth, in regard to this bill. It is a mere use of words. In the present instance, instead of the Government, as it has done in the past, giving away an empire to the railroad companies to build up the very country in which my friend lives, which the Senators and Members of the House in those days said was a wilderness and a desert and was not worth getting title to, the statesmen of those days turned around and gave away territory larger many times than the gentleman's State so that they might build railroads.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there for a question?

Mr. RAKER. In a moment. So that they might build railroads through the gentleman's country and through the western country; so that it might be built up and thus yield up its minerals and everything else. They voted aid to the railroads to produce such conditions.

That appears to be all right; but in Alaska, where you tied up the coal and the water power and the land and every resource on earth, so that a man could not go there with any prospect of development, instead of giving, as you have done in the past, aid to open up these great empires in the West, including a part of the State from which my friend comes, you go to work in a business way and spend a little money to develop that great empire, and then talk about "socialism" in developing this Government's property where it has the ownership and control of all of it, to the end that the people now may have some use of it and that it may not go to a particular class.

Now I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. Let us leave ancient history behind us and get down to the present day. Is the gentleman from California willing to appropriate money and sustain small railroads that can not otherwise be sustained and that run through richer territory than that in Alaska? Is the gentleman willing to do for other parts of the country what he is willing to do for Alaska?

Mr. RAKER. The Congress has passed a railroad bill and given consideration to the railroads. Unfortunately it did not treat the short-line railroads as it treated the transcontinental lines. Had it been fair and had it given the short-line railroads the proper treatment, the treatment that they should have had, most of them would have been in existence. Just as one line that runs through my country to-day. The owner has been in town for a week. A transcontinental line has taken the major portion of its receipts from freight and fares and the short line is living at the small end of it, and it is a question whether or not it will exist. The Post Office Department gives it $10 for carrying the mail. Then it turns right around and pays a contractor every week 10 times what it gives to the railroad.

Mr. WINGO. I want an answer to my question. Will the gentleman answer it?

Mr. RAKER. I am going to answer it if I get to it. That is not a parallel case. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from California may have another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY], will be recognized.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that this is a socialistic proposition at all. There is no one in the House more opposed to socialism than I am. I do not consider this bill as socialistic.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CURRY. I regret I can not.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. CURRY. If it is socialism it is a socialistic proposition that was started in 1914, at which time the party of which the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] is a member had a big majority, both in the House and Senate, and also had the President. [Laughter.]

Mr. WINGO. Is that the gentleman's only defense? [Laughter.]

Mr. CURRY. I decline to yield.

Now, the gentleman speaks of building a railroad in a wilderness. All these big transcontinental railroads were constructed to open up wildernesses. Jim Hill opened up the great big States of North and South Dakota and all that country by a railroad through the wilderness. One of these States had turned socialistic; but, thank God, the other day she came back where she formerly belonged, having gotten tired of socialism. I do not think there are many Members of socialistic tendencies on this side of the aisle; probably there are more on that side than there are on this side. I think perhaps some Members of Congress who ought to have been elected on the socialistic ticket, if at all, were elected on the Democratic ticket. [Laughter.] But when you come to consider it, this railroad in Alaska was not built as a Government investment. It was built as a part of the Government's plan to develop Alaska. It was not built to be retained in perpetuity by the Government. The original act contains a provision whereby the road may be leased or sold. If it is sold they will have to come to Congress for the necessary legislation.

That country up there is a great country and ought to be opened up and developed. This bill alone will not open up Alaska. If you wish the resources of Alaska to be developed you will have to get rid of the red tape of the bureaucratic Government here in Washington in which it is bound up and give men opportunity to go up and develop Alaska with their brains and brawn and money. Otherwise it will not be opened up.

This road is but a means to an end. After this road is built there is no question but that legislation will be enacted to open up Alaska, and good red-blooded young American men and women will go up there and develop the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I desire to speak on the committee amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the pro forma amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas is withdrawn.

Mr. CURRY. The vote should be on the committee amendment, should it not?

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] rises to speak on the committee amendment.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I voted for this proposal in the first instance with considerable hesitation. I am inclined to think the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] was right when he said at that time that what Alaska needed was more policy than direct aid. But at that time, while the policy was not indicated, there was in one way a great general scheme in the minds of the American people, of which this bill was a part. It was then believed, and it is believed now—and so far as there is any information before the House that belief is well founded—that the resources of Alaska are enormous, almost beyond calculation. It was intended at that time that these resources should not be exploited or monopolized by a few individuals. As a part of that plan the original act providing for the construction of this road was enacted. Whether that was wise or not is not necessary to be discussed at this time. We have put over $50,000,000 into this railroad. It will be completed only by the addition of this sum which is now proposed. The purpose of that act at that time was not socialistic. It was simply to prevent the monopolization of the great and supposedly unparalleled resources of this immense territory.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. We put many millions of dollars into the Muscle Shoals project. Then afterwards we declined to go any further with that, did we not?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes; but there was always very great criticism of that whole Muscle Shoals project, while at the time this act was passed by the Congress there was hardly a voice raised over this whole land against it. The whole country approved the plan of this Congress, deciding that the great resources of Alaska should not pass into the hands of a few men.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The Federal Government appropriated for the examination of herds of cattle scattered over this country about $1,785,000.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I hope my friend will not drag me onto a cow trail.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. No; I just want to get the gentleman's sense of relative proportion on this proposition.

Mr. LAYTON. The gentleman wishes to discuss the question of relativity.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Herds of cattle in the gentleman's State of Iowa, as well as in Maryland, Pennsylvania, and other States, have been examined not only by the veterinarians of our Agricultural Department but by the veterinarians of our own States.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman please make his question short?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Many herds have been condemned, and there is no appropriation to pay for the tuberculous cattle that have been killed. The farmers have acted upon this proposition in good faith. Does not the gentleman think it would be better, as a matter of good faith, to keep the honest contracts we made with those people than it is to throw away $4,000,000 up in Alaska?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I shall have to decline to yield further.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, as I have said, the country never considered this as any model proposition with the idea that the Government was embarking upon the operation of railroads. The purpose was far different, and that purpose was ratified by the country with almost no objection. The sum of $4,000,000 is now needed to complete this proposition. Shall we deny it? Even the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] says the money ought to be voted at this time, although he opposed the project with all his force at the time when it was originally enacted. Mr. Chairman, I insist that there is but one thing to do in the situation before the House, and that is to adopt the committee amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, considerable of the discussion on this bill has seemed to proceed on the theory that if we follow the recommendation of the Committee on the Territories the Committee on Appropriations will proceed immediately to appropriate all or a large portion of the sum authorized to be expended. That does not follow at all. The question now before the House is not as to how much money we shall spend in the next fiscal year on the Alaskan Railroad. The question is, rather, Shall we at this time determine that the Alaskan Railroad as originally planned shall be completed, and authorize appropriations to be made from time to time as they are warranted for the purpose of completing it? I am not sufficiently well informed as to the situation in Alaska to know how much the Committee on Appropriations will be justified in appropriating this winter if this bill becomes a law. I doubt if anyone is at this time so informed. But we must assume that if we authorize the ultimate completion of the road the appropriations for that purpose will be made only so rapidly and at such times as the Committee on Appropriations and the House, if it agree with the committee, shall determine to be proper and practical, taking into consideration the desire of Congress and of the country to be as economical as possible in our expenditures.

I trust that gentlemen will not be influenced in voting on this bill by any idea that the Committee on Appropriations will include in the first appropriation bill the sum necessary to complete the Alaskan Railroad. I should hope, at least, that the committee would not do that. Our duty is to determine whether the Alaskan Railroad shall be completed; and if so, to determine the sum we shall eventually authorize to be appropriated for its completion, leaving with the Appropriations Committee to determine when the appropriation shall be made and the rapidity with which the development and completion of the road shall be carried on.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, several gentlemen have spoken of this as a socialistic proposal. I was a Member of the House when the original bill to build this railroad was introduced at the suggestion of President Wilson. It received the enthusiastic, and, I think, well-nigh unanimous support of the members of his party on this floor, and not one of them suggested that it was in the remotest degree a socialistic proposition which was being urged by that distinguished Democrat.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, the gentleman from Wisconsin does not want that statement to stand, many Democrats fought it bitterly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not remember of anybody stating that it was socialistic.

Mr. WINGO. They all said that it was socialistic, and if the gentleman gets the RECORD and reads the minority report he will see something. The gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. Davenport, made a minority report.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do not remember of anything being said to the effect that Woodrow Wilson had proposed a bill socialistic in character.

Mr. Chairman, it has been several times declared during this debate that what Alaska needs is not this appropriation of money to complete that railroad, but the establishment of a policy which will permit the development of her great natural resources. These gentlemen seem to have assumed that the question of a policy for the development of Alaska was not considered here when Congress passed the original bill appropriating $35,000,000 to build this railroad in that Territory. But in assuming this these gentlemen are mistaken, for Congress did then discuss and decide the question of such policy for Alaska.

Now, there are two methods by which this Government has secured the building of railroads through uninhabited territory. One of these was by granting public lands to railroad corporations as was done in the cases of the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific roads. I remember that in the contest, during my first term in the House, over the bill to refund the debts of those two roads, it was brought out that the Government had given those corporations 26,000,000 acres of the public lands, the grant extending for miles on each side of the right of way. That was the land-grant policy of building railroads.

Now, it has been said here repeatedly to-day, and it was suggested by the gentleman from Ohio, and in a measure indorsed by the gentleman from Iowa, Judge GREEN, that we adopted a wrong policy in 1914 when the House and the Senate passed the bill appropriating $35,000,000 in money to build a railroad in Alaska. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I beg you to understand that it was then understood that the contest over that bill to appropriate $35,000,000 was on a question of policy, and that the policy was deliberately adopted with the aid of a pretty large majority of Democrats on this floor. What was the question then debated and decided? It was, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, whether the policy of donating coal lands, agricultural lands, and other lands to railroad companies and letting them build the road and make unlimited millions out of the natural resources of the country should be again adopted, or whether there should be a new policy adopted in Alaska of appropriating money for the project, and of reserving the valuable natural resources of Alaska for proper development by settlers and others under laws subsequently to be passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin was given two minutes more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, the question was then whether we should, as I said, appropriate that money, save these resources, and allow them under appropriate laws to be developed.

If this bill passes I hope such laws will be passed by this Congress before it passes out in 1923. They ought to be enacted. But the exact question in 1914 was, Shall we again indulge in a land-grant policy, or shall we adopt another policy, appropriate $35,000,000 to build a railroad, and save the vast natural resources for legitimate development. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], and I voted for the adoption of the last-mentioned policy, and I think that under all circumstances our votes were eminently wise. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I have heard a number of gentlemen during the course of this debate speak of Alaska as a worthless wilderness, of no value and unworthy of the expenditure of any considerable sum in its development.

We purchased Alaska from Russia at a cost, I think, of $7,250,000. It had proved to be a valueless asset to Russia. She had never made anything out of it and was willing to sell it to us for a very small sum. But Alaska has paid for itself to the United States over and over and over again. It has not been to us a valueless asset; it has been a most valuable asset. The fact that the mineral resources are there in great quantities is a demonstrated fact. It has been demonstrated by the untold millions of dollars of gold that have been taken out of it. Oh, the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] made an argument which, in my opinion, was a good argument as applied to the original proposition of 1914, but it is not applicable to-day. We have put into this proposition $52,000,000, and the question now is whether we are going to make an effort to save that money or not. If we do not complete that railroad, the $52,000,000 we have expended are absolutely lost. There is a possibility of getting some of it back by completing the railroad. We certainly will not get any back if we do not. If we attempt to deal with private enterprise on the basis of an uncompleted railroad we would be dealing at very great disadvantage, under conditions where all the advantages of bargaining would be on the side of private enterprise. We must complete this railroad in order to make a good bargain; and I believe if we do complete the road and open up this country to development that we can get back all, or a major portion, at least, of our investment. The valuable mineral resources are there, but are unavailable until transportation facilities have been furnished. I am inclined to think it was unwise to undertake this proposition. I agree absolutely with what the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, Senator BURTON, has said. Alaska needs a policy rather than financial aid from the Government; but we started the project, invested an enormous amount of money in it, and it is now up to us to save it if we can, and not throw it away. I believe it can be saved; and whether all of it can be saved or not, it is wise to pass this bill if the completed railroad can be sold for any considerable amount more than the $4,000,000 we now propose to put in it. I believe it is an act of prudence and good judgment to make this authorization. [Applause.]

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this amendment and all amendments thereto, and on this section and all amendments thereto, be closed in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Chairman, I voted for the original bill to authorize the construction of this railroad in Alaska, and participated in the debate. The same question that is raised now was raised against the proposition then, to wit, that it is socialistic. I took the position that it is not. I tried to make the distinction between what might be justly termed socialistic and what might not. As to the extent of proper functions of Government, no one has yet been able to define their exact limits, but my view was and is that an enterprise like this which will not be constructed in any reasonable time by private enterprise may be properly undertaken by the Government in order to develop the industry and commerce of the country. Instead of discouraging private enterprise, as is often the case with too much Government intrusion in private business, this project on the contrary encourages private enterprise and increases the opportunity therefor. It is a general rule, acknowledged by writers on politics and political economy, that the Government should not undertake business that can be successfully carried on by private enterprise, but where it can not be so carried on or is not likely to be, then the Government may undertake it in the interest of the general welfare. The Government owns and operates the Panama Canal for this reason, and many other undertakings. The construction of this railroad will open a vast field for private enterprise and development. Here is an empire in itself, filled with unknown and known mineral wealth and other natural resources which can be developed, but it can not be developed until you have a railroad. There is no one willing now to construct the railroad and probably will not be for generations, unless perhaps it might be some monopoly which in that event would not only own the railroad, but probably monopolize whatever natural resources there were in the country. So that I think the argument that has been made so strenuously here that this is socialistic in its tendency is based on a fallacy. It would have been just as fallacious to claim when the first great continental railroads were built by aid of Government grants and Government credit were socialistic in their tendency. The only reason the Government gave away that large domain of public land and guaranteed the capital invested to develop the whole of the Pacific and intermountain region was because there was no one in sight, and no prospect that there would be one who would undertake the building of those roads, and without a railroad that country would still be mostly a wilderness. So that the Government taking hold of the matter resulted in opening that region where millions of people now engage in private enterprise and have established great commonwealths. Just the same logic applies here. If what we know about Alaska is true, the completing of this railroad which is nearly complete would open a field for thousands and perhaps millions to pursue private industry and business and build up prosperous communities where there is nothing but a wild waste.

I therefore contend, the same as I did when the bill originally came up, that this is an exception to the rule that Government enterprise drives out private industry, but on the other hand it augments and stimulates it and encourages it. I favor the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and on a division, at the suggestion of the Chair, there were—ayes, 53, noes, 17.

So the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: On page 1, line 8, after the word "amended" insert by amending the first clause in section 2 to read as follows:

"That the cost of the work authorized by this act shall not exceed $56,000,000, and in executing the authority granted by this act the President shall not expend or obligate the United States to expend more than that sum; and"——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Indiana yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Has not that clause of this section been amended once?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. No. When the $17,000,000 was authorized it was authorized in the same way that this is attempted to be authorized. It should have been corrected at that time. Mr. Chairman, this bill is simply the addition of a proviso to section 2 of the original bill, which reads as follows:

That the cost of the work authorized by this act shall not exceed $35,000,000, and in executing the authority granted by this act the President shall not expend or obligate the United States to expend more than such sum.

That sum has been expended. It is proposed by this proviso merely to say:

Provided further, That in order to complete the construction and equipment of the railroad between Seward and Fairbanks, together with the necessary sidings, spurs, and lateral branches, there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, in addition to all sums heretofore appropriated therefor, the sum of $4,000,000.

And so forth.

If that section then were taken as amended after we get through, unless we agree to the amendment I suggest, section 2 would read, in effect, that the cost can not exceed $35,000,000 and that the President could not pay more than $35,000,000, but that there was hereby appropriated $4,000,000 more.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. Did not the first provision which was enacted, allowing the additional $17,000,000 to be appropriated, repeal the original act by implication, because it was inconsistent with the provisions of the first act as to the amount to be expended?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think that the Treasury Department must have so construed it, because they allowed the additional amounts to be paid out.

Mr. CLOUSE. Would not that be true as a matter of law, that it would be a repeal by implication, since the last provision was inconsistent with the original?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, it certainly would if it were in a separate act, but as to a proviso added to the section which is inconsistent with the first, I do not know whether it repeals it or not. I would say as a matter of law it would probably be held to repeal the first provision. Anyone looking at the section as amended would say that it stated two inconsistent provisions. Now, we are enacting a law, and I do not know of any reason why we should put in the law a section as amended which will contain two absolutely inconsistent provisions.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman kindly inform the committee how the bill will read if his amendment is adopted? It is difficult for me to make sense out of the proposed amendment in connection with the pending bill.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Well, the bill will read down to line 6 as it is now, where it is further amended by amending——

Mr. STAFFORD. As amended.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. After the word "amended."

Mr. STAFFORD. But there are two "amended" in the line. Does the gentleman refer to the second "amended"? The gentleman's amendment does not designate after which word "amended" he intends to insert his amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. After the second word "amended."

Mr. STAFFORD. How will it read then?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Then it will read—by amending the first clause in section 2 to read as follows: "That the cost of the work authorized by this act shall not exceed $56,000,000, and in executing the authority granted by this act the President shall not expend nor obligate the United States to expend more than that sum," and—

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to make the change indicated by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment in the manner in which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. SANDERS of Indiana: Page 1, line 6, after the second word "amended," insert by amending the first clause in section 2 to read as follows: "That the cost of the work authorized by this act shall not exceed $56,000,000, and in executing the authority granted by this act the President shall not expend nor obligate the United States to expend more than that sum," and—

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I do not see the necessity for this amendment. It looks to me as if it were absolutely surplussage, that it accomplishes nothing that is not already accomplished by the bill as it is. The President could not exceed the authority to expend or obligate the Government to expend more than $35,000,000. When it was found that the $35,000,000 was not sufficient the President came to the Congress with a request for an additional appropriation of $17,000,000. That request came through the Secretary of the Interior. The $17,000,000 in the identical form of this bill was authorized in 1919. It was found that sum was not sufficient and he did not expend more than $17,000,000. They have $2,300,000 left. They found the money would not complete the road and they came with an estimate and a request for an additional authorization. The money could not be expended, and it will not be expended even if authorized, until appropriated. There is no violation of law, no inconsistency of law.

The statute read in the form of similar statutes, and I do not see any reason for the change. I do not think it will improve the bill, and I do not think it is necessary, and I hope the amendment will not be agreed to for that reason. I do not believe in establishing such precedents.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana.

The question was taken and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TOWNER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 8442), had directed him to report the same back with an amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and the amendment to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time; was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CLARKE of New York and Mr. WINGO. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no quorum present. In that way we will get a roll call.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Wait until the House divides.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 81, noes 28.

Mr. WINGO, Mr. CLARKE of New York, and Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. LAYTON. I ask for a yea and nay vote, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER. Clearly there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 198, nays 78, answered "present" 2, not voting 154, as follows:

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. COLLIER. I would have voted "nay," but I will answer "present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. CURRY a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. 8442) was passed was laid on the table.

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE OF KENNAMER AGAINST RAINEY.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to call up the contested-election case of Kennamer against Rainey.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to call up the contested-election case of Kennamer against Rainey. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, of course there ought not to be any objection to that being considered at the proper time. This is Calendar Wednesday. Is it in order to make a request for unanimous consent on Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER. Well, the Chair thinks it would dispense with further proceedings of Calendar Wednesday. It can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection?

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is his request to dispense with further proceedings on Calendar Wednesday? Does the gentleman from Iowa make that request?

Mr. DOWELL. It amounts to that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I suggest the gentleman make it that way.

Mr. DOWELL. I will make that request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the contested-election case of Kennamer against Rainey.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk proceeded to read.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa submits the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Charles B. Kennamer was not elected a Representative in this Congress from the seventh congressional district of the State of Alabama, and is not entitled to a seat herein.

Resolved, That L. B. Rainey was duly elected a Representative in this Congress from the seventh congressional district of the State of Alabama, and is entitled to retain his seat herein.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a unanimous report of the committee after a very careful investigation of this case. I only want to read one paragraph of the report to show to the House the action of this committee:

On the whole case the official returns show the contestee, L. B. Rainey, received a majority of 739 votes, and the evidence submitted in this case does not sustain the charges of the contestant that contestant should be declared elected.

Unless some one desires to be heard, without further comment on the case, I will move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. DOWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege. It has been but a few hours since I was put on the rack in a most insolent, brutal, and supercilious manner by the ex-associate of William Barnes, of New York, a crook, a man whom ex-President Theodore Roosevelt called a crook, who sued Roosevelt for damages, whereupon Roosevelt went into the courts and proved Barnes to be a crook.

I was denounced by name. My statements here on the floor were charged to be false. That Senator had the impudence to demand that I come before his committee after he had denounced me here on the floor. Only a few hours have intervened since that attack was made on me by name, involving my honor and the honor of my State, which sent me here, not hundreds of thousands of votes behind the ticket, as the Senator from New York was sent here, but ahead of the ticket.

I produced here on the floor of the Senate a picture of a gallows at Gievres in France, on which American soldiers were hanged, and they said the picture was a fake. That picture was kodaked by a Georgia soldier, who is now flying to this city as fast as the train can bring him. I mean temporarily to displace one of my secretaries and appoint him, so that he can stand here by my side and substantiate every word that I have said.

I do not allow any man, here or elsewhere, to question my word. I do not allow any man to put demands on me.

There comes to my office by this morning's mail a copy of the Passaic Daily Herald, of Passaic, N. J. Could I have the attention of the Senators from New Jersey? Are they in their seats? One of them thrust himself into this debate. Where is he now? There [indicating] are two pictures in the daily paper; one of the American soldier being prepared for death on the gallows, and the other where he is dying, at the end of a halter. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] last night made several requests that things go into the RECORD. I ask that these pictures go into the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. SMOOT. What was the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the pictures to which he has referred in his statement be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MOSES. As chairman of the Committee on Printing, I shall have to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. That is a very unfair objection.

Mr MOSES. The rule, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to say——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I do not permit you to say anything since your objection. I have the floor. I send to the desk and ask to have read into the RECORD the following letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will read the communication.

The reading clerk read as follows:

ALPHA SIGMA PHI HOUSE,
3617 Locust Street, Philadelphia, November 1, 1921.

Hon. THOMAS WATSON.

DEAR SIR: In this evening's Philadelphia Ledger I read an account of your charges concerning the hanging of American soldiers in France. I also noted that you submitted a photograph as part of your proof.

It might be of interest to you to know that at the present time I have in my possession two such photographs which depict the hanging of an American Negro soldier in uniform. This took place at Bazoilles-sur-Meuse on a scaffold especially erected for that purpose.

I can supply positive proof of the incident not only through these photographs but also from most every member of Evacuation Hospital No. 6. We were "invited" to this execution, which took place in either June or July, 1918, and despite strict orders that no photographs were to be taken there were a few who managed to get them.

As far as I know not one of us knew or ever definitely found out from reliable source just what the charge against this soldier was. I can not say whether any more executions took place upon this same scaffold, for we moved to a new sector soon after. I heard later, however, that it had been used again.

I do not know whether any of this will be of any special interest to you, but I wish to say that should the photographs which I speak of be of any help to you or the investigating committee in this matter I will gladly send them and answer any questions which I can that will aid the work.

I am, very sincerely, J. DANBY CONWELL.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a brief telegram from the State of the Senator from New York from a major in the United States Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

NEW YORK, November 2, 1921.

Senator THOMAS E. WATSON,
(General) Washington, D. C.:

Can assist you substantiate charges read in papers. Registered letter follows mail to-night.

Maj. ———.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I send to the Secretary's desk a telegram from Alabama, which I request may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

DOTHAN, ALA., November 2, 1921.

Senator TOM WATSON,
Washington, D. C.:

Good-thinking and true Americans indorse your charge that soldiers were hanged without trial. I glory in your courage and good sense, and your value in the Senate to the people of the United States is incalculable. Ask TOM HEFLIN who I am.

B. G. FARMER.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I send to the Secretary's desk a telegram from Morrisburg, Ontario, Canada. Canada is doing much for its ex-soldiers, while we refuse to do anything for ours.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I will not.

Mr. EDGE. I understood the Senator to refer to the Senators from New Jersey, and I imagined that he would yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator declines to yield at present. Without objection, the telegram which the Senator from Georgia has sent to the Secretary's desk will be read. The Chair hears none.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

MORRISBURG, ONTARIO, November 2, 1921.

THOMAS E. WATSON,
United States Senator from Georgia,
Washington, D. C.:

I can furnish a volume of additional evidence to your allegations. What you charge is no comparison. Wire or letter will reach me at the above city. Confidential. J. J. FRY.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I ask to have read at the Secretary's desk a telegram which I have received from Tampa, Fla.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[Telegram.]

TAMPA, FLA.

Senator WATSON,
Washington, D. C.:

I notice in newspaper of your charges of crimes committed to A. E. F. man in France. I will help you in a lot of those charges. The Adjutant General has my records of my confinement as prisoner for four months in five different prisons for being A. W. O. L. 48 hours L. A. M.

MURRAY GORDON,
Private 30199, France, 17 months.
Address 1201 Franklin Street.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I send another letter, and ask that it may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

61 COLUMBIA STREET,
Albany, N. Y., November 2, 1921.

Senator THOMAS E. WATSON,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It has been with a great deal of interest that I have read the articles in the daily papers regarding your charges of inhuman treatment accorded the soldiers of the American Expeditionary Forces in France. To my mind you deserve unbounded praise and credit for the forceful way you have gone about these matters, and I know that hundreds of other ex-service men like myself will applaud your efforts and be with you in spirit in the thrashing out of the charges you have made.

Personally I do not know of the hanging affairs, but I was on duty with the judge advocate general's office and the inspector general's office of the Forty-second Division ("Rainbow"), and I do know of a great many unfair things that happened. I do not want you to get the impression that I am what is popularly known as a "sore-head" because I was pretty much able to fight my own battles, but the cases which I ran into while with the judge advocate in as far as the courts-martial were concerned were nothing short of tragedies.

I admit frankly that I did not honestly do my duty while with this office. I was the stenographer, I knew the Court-Martial Manual. Trial judge advocates were appointed who before they went into service were grocery clerks, oil salesmen, etc., and the Court-Martial Manual was simply a bunch of words, and the form used in the conduct of a trial usually started at the wrong end and wound up in the middle. I am glad to say that my knowledge of procedure, which I learned in the judge advocate's office, was of material help to me mixing up the reports of trials, which, of course, in many instances threw the case out or forced the commanding general through recommendation of the division judge advocate to cut the sentences imposed by the court to a mere matter of detail with the accused's company. We had a Capt. Harding from Ohio who was president of many courts-martial. His slogan was "Give 'em 20 years." If you can find the records of the Forty-second Division, you will see that almost without exception the decisions of the courts presided over by Capt. Harding read, "* * * and to be confined at hard labor for 20 years." If you were a deserter or stole a bunch of grapes from a vineyard, it was all the same to Harding, 20 years was both maximum and minimum.

Permit me to congratulate you on the good start you have made and to wish you every success in your efforts.

Respectfully, yours,

THOMAS F. GOWRAN,
Former Regimental Sergeant Major,
Inspector General's Department, Forty-second Division.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I beg to have the clerk read the matter which I send to the desk as to the death of a New Jersey soldier.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

[From the Passaic (N. J.) Journal of July 29, 1919.]

SOLDIER OF THREE HUNDRED AND NINTH INFANTRY BAYONETED FOR REFUSING TO CARRY A GUN—STORY HUDSON COUNTY DRAFT MEN HAVE BEEN TELLING FRIENDS IS MADE PUBLIC BY COMRADE OF DEAD SOLDIER.

The story of the death of Pvt. Frank Frye, of Company D of the Three hundred and ninth United States Infantry, a New Jersey draft unit and composed almost entirely of Hudson County men, has been made public after being whispered about by soldiers and their relatives here ever since the regiment came back from France.

The story is that Frye, who lived at 118 Putnam Street, Paterson, was bayoneted in cold blood for having conscientious objections to bearing arms.

Frye, according to the story, was stabbed through the heart by a sergeant of his regiment in France, August 22, just before the regiment was about to go into action.

The boy's mother having been apprised of the story has wired to Washington asking the captain of the company in which her son served for particulars regarding his death, but the War Department has sent the laconic reply, "Pvt. Frye was killed August 22." No details were sent the heartbroken mother.

But the case is not to be allowed to rest there. From several sources came the tip that the friends and other citizens who have become interested in the case do not intend to rest until the matter has been thoroughly sifted. Further revelations are anticipated.

Samuel Long, of 11 Twenty-first Avenue, Paterson, who was with Frye in the Three hundred and ninth United States Infantry, made the story public in a statement issued to-day. In this statement Long says:

"On February 23, 1918, we went to Camp Dix. It was at the camp that I first met Frye. We sailed in May and landed in Folkstone, England, June 5. We were both members of Company D, Three hundred and ninth Infantry. After leaving Folkstone on June 11 we traveled to Calais, France, where we remained for three days. We then went to a little French village called Bouvlinghem, where we received our first training, such as drills, bayonet practice, gas-mask exercise, hikes, etc.

"Frye was a nice young chap. We bunked together at Camp Dix, and he naturally got to be a little confidential with me. On five or six occasions he told me he didn't like the idea of being in the Infantry, as his convictions were opposed to war. He didn't like the idea of killing anyone. Often he told me he'd willingly serve his country in any noncombative work in which he wouldn't have to carry a rifle and shoot down his fellow man.

"Finally he made his first request of the captain for assignment to duties in the medical corps, or some other noncombative branch of the service, but got no satisfaction. He was not transferred, while others were. When he saw this he told the captain that under no circumstances would he kill a man. He said he simply couldn't do it.

"I sympathized with Frye in every respect and tried to influence him against anything that would arouse the distrust of his superior officers. He told me that when we got over to France he would refuse to carry a gun.

"So when we arrived at the bayoneting field in Bouvlinghem, he threw down his gun. Our lieutenant wanted to know what was the matter. Frye then quietly explained his feelings about killing men and said he couldn't see why he should carry a gun. Of course, when Frye threw down his gun he disobeyed an order and was placed under guard.

"The bayoneting field was exceedingly stony, and Frye was put to work gathering rocks and piling them along the border of the field. This was his penalty. All the officers, including the colonel, tried to convince him to do as ordered. Once again he reiterated his statement that he was willing to do anything but carry a gun. He said he was willing to share the burdens of men at the front as a stretcher bearer or anything else, but wouldn't kill a man.

"From Friday, June 14, until Thursday, July 18, when the regiment moved to a place called Averdoingt for more training, Frye was kept at work clearing the field of Bouvlinghem of rocks. When we moved to Averdoingt Frye was always strictly under guard. During the day he worked at various things and went to the guardhouse at night. He was always watched by a sentry with fixed bayonet.

"But, meanwhile, the authorities had evidently been contemplating court-martial of Frye, for toward the end of July three Patersonians—myself; J. J. Miller, of 91 Marshall Street; and Louis Goldberg, whose address I don't know—appeared at the trial as witnesses for him. The trial was held at Rollecourt, 6 miles from Averdoingt. None of us, not even Frye, ever heard officially what his sentence had been. In fact, we were not sure that the trial had ended. It was rumored among the fellows of the company, however, that Frye had been given a sentence of 20 years.

"Tuesday, August 20, the outfit moved to the railroad at Tincques and started our first move toward the front. We rode two nights and a day and then got off at Vitrey-Vernois. It is usual for troops, when carrying packs and paraphernalia, to line up in readiness to pitch tents in military formation. I noticed that Frye had been quiet on the train, for we were both in the same car. He didn't eat, but instead kept studying his New Testament all the time, and I could see that something was on his mind. He questioned me as to why he had not been informed of his sentence, and said that if he had been given a term he should be serving it instead of going up to the front. We all knew we were going into the fighting soon. Frye was still under guard. He had no gun.

"When we got off the train Frye refused to go any farther. He demanded to know his sentence. A lieutenant of the company tried to force him to put his pack on by swinging him by the arms and struggling with him, but he did not succeed. The captain was busy lining us up along the tracks to pitch tents, and the lieutenant said, 'Captain, what shall I do with Frye? He won't put his pack on. I don't know what to do about it.' The captain answered, 'Take the man away from me; I haven't time to bother with him.' Then the lieutenant went over to the major. I don't know the exact words they said, but the major picked out a sergeant who had lost his stripes. This sergeant had been bayonet instructor on the first field on which we drilled. The major, it developed, ordered the sergeant to see that Frye carried his pack.

"They have a military formation called 'right dress.' My face was turned when I heard the words, 'Frye's dead. They've stabbed him!' I turned around quickly, and Frye had just fallen and the doctor pronounced him dead and put a blanket over his body. He had been stabbed through the heart with a bayonet by the sergeant. None of us thought anything like that would ever occur. We all felt sick and disgusted over the incident.

"Frye was always ready to do the little favors known only to Army men, and for that reason we all liked him. We all felt bad over his death. We slept there that night and the next morning hiked to Serqueneaux. A detail was picked out from the company to remain behind and bury Frye's body. There were no Patersonians in the detail.

"The sergeant was later court-martialed and acquitted, it being ruled that he was obeying orders.

"I'd like to say something for Frye. He was a fine fellow and it was disgraceful the way they used him. They didn't act intelligently with him. The officers never tried to help him. Time after time he had asked for noncombative duties, but had always been refused."

[From the Jersey City (N. J.) Journal of Aug. 2, 1919.]

JERSEY CITY SOLDIER TELLS HOW FREY WAS BAYONETED—CORROBORATION OF PVT. LONG'S SICKENING STORY SPURS NEW JERSEY REPRESENTATIVES IN CONGRESS TO FURTHER ACTION—RADCLIFFE SPEAKS OUT.

More details of the killing of Pvt. Frank Frey, of Company D, of the Three hundred and ninth United States Infantry, in France last summer by a sergeant to whom Frey had been turned over after Frey had protested against doing combat duty, came to light to-day when Pvt. Fred Schuch, who served in France and now resides at 208 Wilkinson Avenue, Jersey City, told more facts about the bayoneting of this conscientious objector.

Schuch bears out the story of Frey's "buddie" Samuel Long, of Paterson.

Schuch's statement to-day corroborates very fully the claim of Frey's many friends that he was unarmed and absolutely defenseless when he was alleged to have been slain by a sergeant, who had been detailed to "handle him."

It is probable that the story of the Jersey City service man will spur on the New Jersey Representatives in Congress, who have taken up the matter with the War Department and who are calling for a rigid investigation.

These New Jersey Representatives include Senators FRELINGHUYSEN and EDGE and Congressman RADCLIFFE, of Paterson, and Congressmen Hamill, Eagan, and McGlennon. Important developments are looked for next week.

First Class Pvt. Schuch was an eyewitness of the tragic death of Pvt. Frank Frey. He says he was standing only a few feet away from Frey when the latter was bayoneted by his guard.

Contrary to the report that Frey was in a crouching position as if to spring at the guard, as was charged by a member of the General Staff, Pvt. Schuch says that Frey was standing erect, with his hands behind his back, facing the guard when he was bayoneted.

As to the fact that Frey was alleged to have been a conscientious objector and other details surrounding the killing, Schuch had no first-hand knowledge while in France. Schuch was not acquainted with Frey and was a disinterested witness of the tragedy. He was attached to the First Battalion headquarters of the Three hundred and ninth Infantry. His statement follows:

"We got into Vitroy late in the afternoon of a day in August, which day I don't remember, right before we got ready for the St. Mihiel drive. As we were getting off the train I saw Frey get off, too. I did not know who he was at that time. I was acting mess sergeant of the First Intelligence Section. I did not see Frey with any pack or rifle. Later I came across the same man under guard at the station. He was standing there for 15 or 20 minutes. I was traveling back and forth getting mess utensils ready for the supper of the men. I passed the prisoner several times during my work.

"The second time on my way back I got within about 2 feet to the rear of him and about 6 feet to the left. His back was toward me, with the guard facing him. Frey was standing erect. I saw no pack on the ground. Then I heard the guard command him to move on. I stopped to see what it was all about. Frey made no move, standing with his hands behind his back. The next instant, without saying another word, the guard thrust the bayonet into the breast of the soldier.

"I saw Frey fall, but waited for no more. I walked away, sick and disgusted, and went ahead getting my men started with supper. I did not know the man's name was Frey until later when I heard some of the men talk about it and say 'it wasn't just.'

"I was in no position to make inquiries to learn the details of the death and therefore knew nothing of Frey's previous record. I heard after the Argonne drive that the guard who did the bayoneting was killed in battle.

"At the time of the killing the whole battalion was lined up not very far away."

Pvt. Schuch went to Camp Dix in April, 1918. He fought in the St. Mihiel sector and Limey and Meuse and Argonne sectors. He was mustered out of Camp Dix on June 12.

Congressman AMOS RADCLIFFE, of Paterson, where Frey lived, Friday sent this statement to the Jersey Journal:

"I wish to say that I have taken this matter up with Congressmen McGlennon, Eagan, and Hamill. We are following the matter up just as rapidly as possible and are in touch with the War Department for the purpose of presenting the case to the Secretary of War. I shall do everything in my power to have this case thoroughly aired by the department for the purpose of giving satisfaction to the folks at home. I feel that the case is a very serious one and demands the most rigid examination to get the correct, definite facts to make a proper example of the guilty parties."

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, when a man's honor is impugned in the most august tribunal in the world, he can not always wait as long as wisdom might dictate. These evidences of confirmation have come to me almost immediately after I made my statement. The original statements upon which I based the earlier speech which I made—and I have never spoken very long on the floor of the Senate—were made to me voluntarily at my home in Georgia. I had every reason to believe them. There was no motive that seemed to actuate the men who made them to misstate the facts, and I believed them. I should be glad to disbelieve them now. If proof can be submitted to the Senate that they are not true, I shall be glad to know that they are not true.

The attempt has been made to put me in the attitude of attacking the Army. I have not done so. On every stump in Georgia last year I said that it was humanly impossible that out of 300,000 officers there should not be humane men, and I happened to know some of them, and I named them. But there were many who were inhumane I think and I believe. When the contrary is shown, I will be glad to disbelieve it.

Of course the life of a private soldier in France is nothing here in comparison with the millions of Henry Ford, who did not send his son to fight; or John D. Rockefeller, who did not send his son to fight. Jay Gould once said he could hire half of our people to kill the other half. Maybe that is so; I do not know; I do not think it is so, but I know this: As long as I in part represent the State of Georgia the ex-private, the sailor, the marine, will have one man on this floor who is not afraid of any man that God ever made, and who will champion his cause to the extent of his ability. You may be well assured of that; and I do not belong to any secret order, either, except that of the Junior Order of United American Mechanics, a comparatively small order and a weak one.

I can show, and I will show, as soon as I can get the evidence, that officers had men shot with no trial whatever. I can show, and will show, that officers told the courts-martial what to do, and the courts-martial had to do it to keep from being shot themselves. I can show it, and I will do it. I will do it in the interest of the American Army, of the American Navy, of the American people.

Can we not have humane soldiers like Gen. Grant and Gen. Lee? Can we not have humane soldiers like George Washington, Gen. Joseph B. Wheeler, and Gen. J. E. B. Stuart? Have we become human brutes because we have put the uniform on and wear the Sam Brown belt?

Mr. President, I will show after a while that a black man clothed in the uniform of the United States Army was hanged like a dog in that uniform, and if anybody disgraced the uniform it was the officer who had him hanged. Where are those reports? Where are those records? Where have the American people been told about this? They gave you $25,000,000,000 of their money. The bankers did not do it; the common people did it. They gave you 4,000,000 of their sons. The common people made this sacrifice.

You will want them again after a while; you will again call for them after a while. You will put your Hoover and your George Creel and your other propagandists after them, to have Liberty bonds bought and soldiers enlisted to fight your battles. You pay no heed to what I am saying to you now; you make a fight on me about this. I throw the challenge at your feet. You said yesterday you were going to put my head against the wall. Come on and do it! Come on and do it!

You have enlisted on my side 3,000,000 ex-service privates, and the Negroes of the North; when they see that picture of a Negro soldier, who volunteered from a pivotal Northern State, hanged in his uniform they will turn their balance of power against you. They would not be human if they did not.

Now, you come on and put my head against the wall. I am here and you are here. Let me see a man who will do it. I will be here when you do it. Hereafter the man who impugns my honor on this floor will answer to me, not only here but somewhere else.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I understand that while I was out of the Chamber the Senator from Georgia referred to the Senators from New Jersey as having had some connection with the matter he has discussed. I believe he submitted a newspaper published in New Jersey that photographs of gallows purported to have been snapped on the other side might be printed in the RECORD. I have hastily looked over the article, and I want to read to the Senate just a couple of the paragraphs published in connection with the description of this execution. One reads:

> The members of Company G witnessed two of the executions at Issurtille, near Camp Williams. The first was that of a Negro who had killed a Frenchman when the latter intervened in an attack by the Negro upon a child.

Another paragraph, referring to the other soldier, a white soldier, I think, reads:

> The real story of the crime he committed is probably on file in the records of the War Department. Perhaps for the sake of his family, they never were and never will be known in connection with his name. So far as the enlisted men who saw the hanging were permitted to know, he had committed a criminal assault upon a 7-year-old French girl, who died following the attack.

Not even an inference that these men were not regularly tried.

I said, in connection with the motion which was made a few days ago, that I believed the Senator from Georgia owed it to his country to produce the evidence he claimed to have that executions occurred without trial. I repeat that assertion, not so much in the Senator's defense, but that the guilty, if such a thing did occur, may be properly punished. I reiterate it with all the emphasis at my command.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, yesterday a very important address was delivered in New York by the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] on the subject of "What's wrong with our Merchant Marine?" I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD, and that it be printed in eight-point type.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

WHAT'S WRONG WITH OUR MERCHANT MARINE?

Address delivered before the Advertising Club, New York, Wednesday, November 2, 1921, by United States Senator JOSEPH E. RANSDELL, president of the National Merchant Marine Association.

Senator RANSDELL spoke as follows:

What's wrong with our merchant marine?

We now have under the American flag a volume of tonnage sufficient to carry all our exports and imports on the present basis of trade. Actually, however, our vessels are transporting about one-third of our foreign commerce, and every month the proportion is shrinking. Within the past year American ships carried more of our trade than the ships of all our foreign competitors combined. Now British vessels alone are transporting more of our commerce than our own ships, and the vessels of the other maritime nations, taken collectively, are transporting almost as much.

It is very apparent that something is radically wrong with our merchant marine. True, the past year has been one of marked depression in international trade. True, too, world shipping is sick; but American shipping is far the sickest of all. On a competitive basis we are well in the rear of the procession.

But let me put myself on record right here as a bull on the American merchant marine. The task ahead of us is a severe one, but what is wrong can be righted. It is only, however, by a realization of the worst that the sentiment necessary to effect the transformation can be crystallized.

OUR SHIPPING NOT A DISMAL WRECK.

The American merchant marine is a very live corpse. The chairman of the Shipping Board says that the fleet cost $3,500,000,000, and experts state that it could have been constructed for one billion in normal times. If so, it ought to be worth at least one billion now, for times are nothing like normal and everything is much higher than normal. But a fleet worth one billion is in itself very respectable—not a dismal wreck by any means. It is unfair to speak of the war-cost portion of the fleet as a wreck. We do not apply that term to the other items of war expense, running into fifty billions. Why not speak of the wreck of the Army and Navy, and the Railroad Administration, and the Treasury, with its ten billions of foreign loans, and many other indispensable expenditures to carry on the war? Out of the war shipping program, which cost $3,500,000,000, we actually salvage $1,000,000,000 worth of property and suffer a loss of only two and a half billions, about 5 per cent of the total expenditures. What other service can make as good a showing?

Within the past year we have added about 2,000,000 gross tons to our foreign trade fleet, an increase of about 20 per cent; but this expansion in our shipping facilities has been accompanied by a practically corresponding decrease in the proportion of American commerce transported in American bottoms.

The outstanding feature of the situation, therefore, is that the more shipping we secure the smaller percentage of our own trade we seem to carry, and the larger portion our foreign competitors secure.

WHAT IS FUNDAMENTALLY WRONG?

This, it is apparent, is what is fundamentally wrong with our merchant marine. But what has caused it? Why, when we offer cargo space, speed of delivery, and service at the same rates as foreign shipowners, are we unable to gain, or even to hold our own, in our own commerce?

We all know, of course, that the American ship costs somewhat more to build, and more to man and operate, than the foreign vessel with which it must compete. This means that the net return on the investment in the American ship, as a general proposition, must be less than on the foreign ship; but it does not explain why, the freight rates being equal, the bulk of the trade goes to the alien competitor, and on an increasing scale.

There is one factor which, I believe, goes far to explain the situation. To the shipper, dependability of service is vital. He must be assured of a regularity of sailings, and he must be able to count upon the delivery of his goods within a specified time. But he never has been assured of a thorough dependability upon the Shipping Board's services, and now, with the wholesale laying up of the board's vessels and the general curtailment of new trade routes, he is turning more and more to other services upon which he can depend, and the foreigner is alive to this situation and quick to take advantage of it.

RAILROADS AIDING FOREIGN LINES.

But there are other and far-reaching underlying causes that are crippling the development of the American merchant marine. Not only is our shipping forced to meet competition from abroad but in many cases that competition is aided and abetted by Americans. In fact, there is no lack of instances where beneficiaries of the American Government, whose enterprises are being aided by Government funds, are turning over to our alien competitors trade that could be handled as expeditiously and efficiently by our new merchant marine.

I refer to our railroads. Nearly a score of them, including the greatest systems of the country, have filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, under a recent order, copies of contracts made by them with foreign shipping lines. In these it is agreed by the railroads that they will use their best efforts to secure freight for the foreign companies to the exclusion of others. Exclusive use of facilities is granted in many cases, free wharfage and freight handling is given, special arrangements on through bills of lading are made, and many other privileges are accorded.

Let me read you brief extracts from one or two of these agreements.

The Pennsylvania system reports an agreement between the Northern Central Railroad (covering its connections) and Furness, Withy & Co., a British corporation, in which the railroad states:

> That it will use its best endeavors to promote the business of the said steamship line and cordially cooperate with it in all reasonable requirements to further its interests.

And it is furthermore agreed:

> That each party will use their best efforts to promote the interchange of business tributary to both companies as against their individual and mutual competitors.

COAL SUPPLIED AT FAVORED RATES.

The Baltimore & Ohio Railroad has a contract with the North German Lloyd Line whereby the railway agrees to furnish free of rent for the line's use and always accessible piers, sheds, coal yards, warehouses, and so forth. It agrees to try to get the vessels of the line exempt from city, harbor, and county taxes, and to do its best to obtain mails for the steamers. And the agreement further states that the railroad—

> Agrees to deliver always for the use of the vessels a sufficient quantity of best fresh Cumberland coal at a price that shall be always 50 cents per ton under the market value at Baltimore, and which price is never to exceed $5 per ton of 2,240 American pounds.

The Boston & Albany Railroad in an agreement with the Cunard Line grants the free and exclusive use of certain piers, and in addition pledges itself to "make all reasonable efforts to secure the amount of export freight required by said steamship company." And it further pledges under certain conditions "a reduced rate of 2½ cents per hundred pounds for freight in carload lots."

As a result of the operation of the various contracts well over a million tons of freight are turned over annually by American railroads to foreign ships. These foreign lines, on their part, agree to deliver as much freight as possible to the contracting railroads, but in the exchange the foreigner gets far the best of it.

GOVERNMENT FUNDS AID OUR RIVALS.

The most amazing aspect of the situation, however, is that the railroads, supplied with funds from the United States Treasury, have been utilizing their resources to build up the business and swell the profits of foreign competitors of the Government's shipping. In other words, the Government of the United States is placed in the position of using its money to foster competition with itself.

You will doubtless be told that the majority of these contracts were entered into at a time when there was no American merchant marine worth mentioning, and that the contracts are legal. Even conceding this, the fact remains that no such agreements have been made for the benefit of the Government's vessels, although we have had a large Government fleet on the sea for more than two years. If the American railroads are not prepared to give to the American merchant marine the same aid they extend to foreigners, steps should be taken to end these conditions. Why should not the Shipping Board secure such agreements and thereby secure employment for thousands of tons of idle vessels?

How are we to escape the conclusion that the American merchant marine has powerful enemies at home working to destroy it? For a year and a half now the merchant marine act of 1920 has been law, but of all its provisions the ones that remain unenforced are those which would increase our share of our carrying trade and decrease the share of our foreign rivals. What is the dead hand of delay that blocks every effort that would check the triumphal march of our alien competitors? If there are sinister influences at work, as is charged with increasing frequency, let us drag them to the light and ruthlessly stamp them out of existence. Not till then shall we be able to realize to the full what is wrong with our merchant marine.

THE GREATEST INDUSTRY OF ALL.

The American merchant marine to-day is potentially the greatest of all American industries. The indicated investment in it is more than $5,000,000,000. It is vital to the prosperity and protection of the country. It is an insurance against war and against the loss of our foreign markets. It furnishes an outlet for our surplus production, and it provides employment, directly and indirectly, through the collateral industries supplying it, for hundreds of thousands. It gives us the means of retaining for our own use hundreds of millions of dollars that we have been sending abroad every year to pay for having our own trade carried for us.

The late war showed us the weakness of a strong navy without a strong merchant marine in the foreign trade as an agency of cooperation. With our international commerce blocked by the operation of German submarines, and with practically no ships of our own available, we realized the value of our coastwise shipping. The splendid volume of tonnage built up in this trade under protection gave us some measure of relief through its transfer in large part to foreign commerce. It fell far short, however, of the needs of the situation.

America furnishes an immense commerce, both domestic and foreign. We are our own best customers. We ship great volumes of merchandise and buy back in large amounts. Foreigners are our competitors in selling. Why should we make our business rivals act as salesmen and delivery wagons for us? Is it reasonable to expect them to work solely for our interest? Would your great merchants, like Wanamaker, Lord & Taylor, or Altman, for instance, be satisfied to have deliveries of their goods made by their competitors? The same principle applies on the seas.

Our vast coast line of thousands of miles on this continent and thousands more in our overseas possessions compels us to use the seas very largely, and our coastwise commerce for more than a hundred years has been carried on under our flag without any foreign competition. The result has beem a splendid fleet.

AMERICAN ENEMIES OF OUR SHIPS.

And yet there are not lacking to-day Americans who declare that we can not maintain a large merchant marine; that we are better off without one; and that we should give up the struggle, junk the bulk of our new tonnage, and return to our prewar position of letting the foreigner carry nine-tenths of our international trade. American ships, it is declared, can not overcome the handicaps that favor foreign vessels in lower construction, operation, and capital costs, and it is futile and costly to try.

It is not surprising to find that the advice of our competitors on the ocean is an echo of the counsel offered by the enemy of the American merchant marine at home. Because we got along before the war without a foreign trade fleet of any consequence, it is argued, there is no necessity for one now; an argument that has a most pleasant sound in the ears of our competitors, who, in the game of give and take, are quite willing to continue on the old basis of giving 10 per cent and taking 90 per cent, even to the extent of saving us the trouble of maintaining a real merchant marine of our own.

This is the twin viewpoint of the international American and of our foreign competitors, and if we look for a further link we shall find one, in the majority of instances, in the widely ramified community of interests established between many American and foreign groups of commercial and financial organizations. If we listen to advice from these quarters, the question will not be, "What is wrong with our merchant marine?" but "Is it worth while?" "Why not kill it?"

Fortunately the hope for the American merchant marine lies in the fact that this is not the viewpoint of the real American, the American American, as opposed to the international American.

THE PEOPLE WANT A GREAT FLEET.

We are all familiar these days with the declaration that the American people are not ship-minded. The international Americans and their foreign confrères have lost no opportunity to attempt to drive the thought home. But I want to tell you here and now that the charge is false. If a full realization of the value of a mighty merchant marine of our own, coupled with a determination never again to find ourselves in the position into which we were thrown through the lack of one in the dark days of the late war, constitutes ship-mindedness, then the American people to-day are indeed ship-minded. If their desire prevails, then indeed the American merchant marine shall not die.

We have heard so often that the people of the interior, to whom the sea is a matter of magnificent distances, have no interest in the future of the merchant marine; that so long as the products of their mines, mills, and lands are delivered to the purchaser abroad, it matters nothing to them what flag is flown by the vessel that carries the goods. If this were true, then indeed it might be said that the people of the great interior States were not ship-minded but international-minded, and that they believed that the interests of American trade abroad could and would be as conscientiously protected and promoted by our competitors as by ourselves.

But it is not true, and I am glad to be able to present concrete evidence of this.

Only within the past few weeks the National Merchant Marine Association, of which I have the honor to be president, undertook, on the initiative of the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, to send speakers throughout the Middle Western States to discuss the shipping situation and to learn the sentiment of the commercial and agricultural interests of that great section, which produces more than half of our exports, in relation to the maintenance of the American merchant marine. Meetings were addressed in 15 cities in 11 different States, and everywhere the greatest interest and enthusiasm in our shipping and the possibilities for its development were manifested.

THE MIDDLE WEST COOPERATING.

As a climax to the speaking tour a meeting was held at Cincinnati on October 7, in which delegations from 23 of the leading Middle West cities participated and at which a declaration of shipping policy was adopted which leaves no particle of doubt as to the desire of the Middle West for the perpetuation of an adequate merchant marine under the American flag.

Furthermore, there was then and there organized a Middle West merchant marine committee, with 23 members, representing commercial organizations in as many different cities. That committee has already sent representatives to Washington, where they have conferred with President Harding and the full membership of the Shipping Board, and have secured from them pledges of hearty cooperation, and, in addition, at the request of Chairman Lasker, of the Shipping Board, a committee of three, representing the Middle West, has been appointed to serve as a means of contact between the Shipping Board, the operating committee of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, and the Middle West.

This is the first time that the general commercial interests of any section of the country have taken steps to work hand in hand with the Shipping Board for the development of American trade in American bottoms, but it need not, and should not, be the last time. I feel sure that I can say that the Shipping Board would welcome to the utmost similar overtures on the part of other sections of the United States. And as an evidence of the willingness of the board to cooperate, I quote from a statement made by Chairman Lasker to the representatives of the Middle West:

At any time where, in the judgment of your constituency, we are not maintaining regular and dependable service, or fail to establish same in the territories indicated to meet your needs, we ask that you promptly take the matter up with us, and pledge the fullest cooperation within our power to do that which will insure the service desired.

ENFORCE THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT.

The Middle West believes that the real road to the successful development of the American merchant marine lies through the prompt and full enforcement of the merchant marine act of 1920, especially those sections providing for the maintenance of new trade routes, equality of opportunity for American ports generally, preferential rail rates on shipments by American vessels, and discriminating duties and tonnage dues.

The Middle West has learned the bitter lesson taught by the late war and is determined to leave no effort untried to prevent a possibility of its repetition. Producing so great a proportion of the country's exports, the prosperity of the Middle West depends upon proper outlets to the sea. Through the congestion that has occurred at the port of New York losses of very many millions of dollars have been incurred by the manufacturing and producing interests of these States through delays, damage, and cancellation of orders. Practical dependence upon a single port, as has been so largely the case in the past, can continue only as a menace to the national welfare. Mountains of merchandise piled up on your wharves, while other ports are idle, form an obstacle to both the development of our foreign trade and our shipping. And continuance of a railroad rate structure which forces the shipper of the interior to send his goods to New York when better facilities can be secured elsewhere is another menace the gravity of which can not be overrated.

There are many fine ports on the Atlantic and the Gulf where facilities for handling freight are as good and in some cases better than at New York. A number of these ports are just as favorably located for rates and quick service on exports and imports as New York, and in some respects have an advantage over it. The interior exporter or importer is not interested in the size of the port where his goods are handled, but in prompt, efficient service, and he should be in a position to select between several ports the one that offers him the best service. This can only result from the establishment by the Shipping Board of new lines at several ports and their maintenance by the Government, even at some loss if necessary, until established and placed on a paying basis.

NEW TRADE ROUTES A VITAL NEED.

Special stress, you will have noted, is laid by the Middle West interests upon the necessity for the maintenance and development of these new trade routes. The importance of this is not to be overestimated, for it will not only open up new avenues of trade for us but will go far in developing the ports of the Nation from a national standpoint, and it is from this standpoint that the problem must be grappled with if our commerce and our shipping as well are to be extended through the medium of the new merchant marine. While it is true that the majority of the new trade routes can not be operated at a profit from the outset, and in some cases years of development work will be necessary, exactly the same thing is true of most new industries, so that shipping is no exception to the rule. That the ultimate return will far more than repay the investment, however, is a prediction I do not hesitate to make. The railroads, our great carriers by land, were unprofitable for many years, and vast sums were spent in their aid by the Government before they became profitable.

We have seen what is being done in the Middle West, but encouraging as the results are the work must not stop there. The shipping problem is not a sectional one but a national one, and the National Merchant Marine Association stands firmly upon the ground that a solution is possible only with the cooperation of all parts of the United States, with the people of the coasts and the interior working hand in hand for national safety and welfare. The Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts, and all the inland States have a common and equal interest in the maintenance of an adequate American merchant marine and a common danger in the situation that confronts us.

The Shipping Board has told us that it will do all in its power to cooperate in the development of these new trade routes within the limitations of the funds granted by Congress, but it is evident that the money in hand will not permit of the full development contemplated by the drafters of the Jones Act. Already the necessity for drastic economies has resulted in the wholesale withdrawal of vessels from these routes. If it is necessary to extend this policy, the outlook for the American merchant marine is even darker than it seems to-day. Abandonment of these routes by our shipping simply throws open to the foreigner the reaping of a harvest sown by our efforts.

GOVERNMENT SHIPS LOSE; OTHERS GAIN.

Do you ask proof of the critical condition of American shipping? You will find ample proof in the official records of the Government. At the outbreak of the war, and for a period of years preceding that, with a foreign trade fleet of about 1,000,000 tons we were carrying about 10 per cent of our own exports and imports. And remember that 10 per cent before the war was representative of a greater volume—not value, but volume—of cargo than it is to-day. But to-day, with a foreign trade fleet thirteen times that of the prewar period, American ships are carrying only about four times the proportion of our exports and imports that they were in 1914.

Last year American ships carried more than half of the country's foreign trade, but since then, despite the fact that we have added about 2,000,000 tons of steel cargo vessels, or about 20 per cent, to our seagoing fleet, the proportion of trade carried under the American flag has diminished more than 10 per cent.

I have here the Shipping Board's own figures of the tons of exports and imports carried in our foreign trade, by months, from July, 1920, to July, 1921, inclusive, and classified by percentages, according to foreign, Shipping Board, and privately owned American vessels. They show that during the period covered, despite a gain of 6 per cent in the proportion carried by private American ships, the total American share of the carrying decreased 7 per cent, due to a drop of 13 per cent in the portion transported by the Government's vessels. In July last, therefore, foreign ships carried 59 per cent of our trade, privately owned American ships 27 per cent, and Shipping Board boats only 14 per cent. Consider, also, that the Shipping Board's 8,000,000-ton fleet, 700 per cent larger than the entire American foreign-trade fleet before the war, carries only 4 per cent more than a prewar body of shipping one-eighth its size.

LAYING-UP POLICY COSTLY.

How the policy of a wholesale laying up of vessels is working to the detriment of the American merchant marine is strikingly shown by the figures for last July, the first month in which the new Shipping Board may be said to have functioned actively and in which heavy withdrawals of vessels were made. In June 20 per cent of the country's combined exports and imports were carried by the board's boats—in July only 14 per cent. But the most disturbing factor is that of this loss of 6 per cent two-thirds was gained by foreign shipping, the remaining one-third going to privately owned American ships. Consider also that if the board's vessels during the coming year lose another 13 per cent of our carrying trade their portion a year from now will be only 1 per cent and that the Shipping Board's loss in the bulk will represent a gain for our competitors.

The one great outstanding fact is that the Government-owned American merchant marine has been put to the acid test of competition and has been found wanting. Burdened with much heavier handicaps than those under which our private vessels labored before the war it has been left to compete with all the ships of other nations, cheaper built, cheaper manned, and cheaper operated. And for a year and a half there has been on the statute books of the Nation provisions that would have enabled us to obtain and retain a just and profitable share of our own carrying trade if they had been enforced.

Let us reduce the situation to the simplest terms possible. Suppose an industry which was practically nonexistent in this country before the war and for whose products we were almost entirely dependent upon other nations. Suppose that under the exigencies of war, unable to secure those products from our customary foreign sources of supply and finding our very existence dependent upon them, we had established such an industry in this country on a scale involving an expenditure of billions of dollars. Akin to other American industries, in that it was conducted in accordance with American standards, and therefore costing more for operation and production than the cheaply paid foreign industries with which it must compete, how could this new industry be made to survive?

NO PROTECTION FOR OUR SHIPS.

Suppose, in other words, that instead of 1,400 ships we had on our hands 1,400 factories, comprising a new industry requisite to the prosperity and protection of our country. Would we junk these factories and give back to foreigners all the trade and the possibilities for trade that had been built up through the expenditure of billions of dollars? Or would we extend to them the same form of protection that we extend to every other American industry of any importance which is menaced by foreign competition? Why should we leave to its own resources, and to certain extinction if unaided, the shipping industry, the most menaced by foreign competition of any, the industry potentially greater than any, and the industry most vital of all to our welfare from the standpoints of commerce and safety?

Yet that is the very thing we are doing, and we are doing it with the instruments in our hands whose utilization will assure success. We do not seek, as other nations seek, a share of the whole world's carrying trade. We seek simply to transport a just share of our own commerce. Great Britain's ships carry 75 per cent of the commerce of the United Kingdom. They carry 90 per cent of the trade with all the British possessions. They carry 25 per cent of the trade between other nations. They carry 35 per cent of the trade of the United States.

Contrast that with our ships. These transport about 40 per cent of our own trade, 6 per cent of Great Britain's, and not 1 per cent of the trade of the rest of the world. We shall be content to transport three-fourths of our own commerce, as Britain does of hers, and who shall gainsay us? We stand upon the firm declaration that every nation is entitled to a just portion of its ocean commerce.

RETALIATION NEED NOT BE FEARED.

There is a word that you have heard with increasing frequency lately, and that you are likely to hear still more frequently. That word is "retaliation." It will be invoked, we are told, if the preferences for American shipping provided in the Jones Act are put into effect, and the result will be the destruction of the American merchant marine. I know of no stronger argument for the efficacy of the Jones bill than these threats—sometimes they are threats and sometimes they are warnings—of retaliation.

These cries of retaliation come almost invariably from our competitors on the seas, and they come loudest from our chief competitors. Considering that the destruction of the American merchant marine would be the finest thing that could happen from the standpoint of our foreign rivals, it is strange to find them advising us not to take steps that would insure the destruction they covet. How much better for them to raise no voice in opposition to the enforcement of the act, and let us rush unwarned to our own doom.

I have said that those who warn us against the effects of retaliation are almost invariably our competitors. I might add that they do not lack echoes in this country, but trace those echoes to their source and you will find yourselves in the strongholds of the international Americans, whose foreign business connections are more precious to them than the welfare of the United States. Occasionally, too, there is a real American with a real dread of retaliation, but he has seen only one side of the picture, and that is the side painted for his benefit by foreign interests and foreign connections. To such I say, "Remember that an increased share of our own trade for our own ships means for foreigners a decreased share of the more than a billion dollars spent annually for the sea carriage of American exports and imports."

DISCRIMINATION WOULD AID US.

Let us look a little further into this question of retaliation. Consider, first, that other nations have taken all the measures within their power to increase their maritime strength, and that what they have left undone has not been due to any policy of altruism, but to the fact that it would weaken their position. Great Britain practiced discriminations of many kinds until the bulk of her own carrying trade was not sufficient to furnish employment for her merchant marine. Then, with a large portion of her fleet trading between non-British ports and open to retaliation at both terminals, she abandoned discrimination and sought a policy of equality of treatment for the ships of all nations in all ports of the world. Her vulnerability to discrimination is freely admitted in the official report of the British Government committee appointed to consider the shipping and shipbuilding policies to be followed after the war.

But this vulnerability does not apply to the American merchant marine. Our own trade is sufficient to furnish ample employment for all our shipping, provided we can meet the competition of other vessels for that trade, and through discrimination the means to that end can be provided.

The commerce between two nations is the chief concern of those nations—the one producing the goods with its toil and the other paying for them with its money. For a third nation, which has no share either in the production or the purchase of the goods, to profit by the transaction by taking over the carriage of the merchandise is a drain upon both the labor and the purse of the principals to the transaction, and takes abroad money which would otherwise serve to maintain the balance between the actual trading nations. It is this form of indirect trading which has enabled a few maritime nations to fasten upon the great bulk of the sea commerce of the United States without any adequate return to us.

COOPERATIVE DISCRIMINATION THE KEY.

By placing no penalization upon direct trade between the United States and any other nation, and limiting all penalization to the indirect trade, there is made possible a system of cooperative discrimination that is not only retaliation proof but that assures to every maritime nation a just share of its own ocean commerce, with a resultant upbuilding of the merchant marine of practically all nations. Let us say to every nation: "The goods of your country and ours when carried between us in the ships of either of us shall not be discriminated against, but the goods transported between our countries under foreign flags shall be subject to a discriminating duty."

Couple with such a system of cooperative discrimination the plan of preferential rail rates provided in section 28 of the Jones bill and limit the application to the indirect trade, and two mighty weapons will have been forged for the maintenance of the American merchant marine. The penalization placed upon indirect trade will place the importer using the ships of the two nations directly involved in the production and purchase of the goods in so strong a position of advantage over the competitor using the vessels of other nationalities that an immense reduction in the volume of indirect trading is inevitable. And with this reduction will come a tremendous increase in the volume of cargo carried by the American merchant marine.

Especially will this be true, for instance, of the trade with South America. Such countries as Argentina and Brazil, for example, by accepting the principle of cooperative discrimination, will find, first, a great increase in customs revenues through the duties imposed on imports brought in in the indirect trade, and following that an increase in the volume and activity of their own shipping, due to the demand for goods carried without penalization, and, therefore, to be had cheaper.

JONES BILL PROVIDES THE REMEDY.

The forces that will bring about these results are provided for in the Jones bill. What can retaliation bring to bear against them when retaliation in kind will be cooperation profitable to the two countries in interest, and therefore to be welcomed by both?

The scope of this indirect trade is indicated by an analysis of the returns of the Department of Commerce made for the National Merchant Marine Association, which shows that of total importations in foreign vessels into this country in 1920, amounting to $2,438,000,000, the indirect imports were valued at $1,095,000,000, or 40 per cent of the whole.

Out of cooperative discrimination will come elimination of the greatest handicaps against the American merchant marine. If our ships are made the most profitable to ship by, the business will flow to them, regardless of foreign connection established in the indirect trade, for as soon as it becomes more costly to use those connections they will be abandoned. Cheaper imports via American ships will mean greater economy for the importer and manufacturer. More cargoes for American ships will mean the need for more ships and consequently more work for American shipyards and for the myriad industries contributing material used in the construction and furnishing of ships. And all this will mean an assured future for an adequate American mercantile fleet.

All that is wrong with American shipping in the disadvantages against it in comparison with foreign tonnage can be remedied by giving to the American merchant marine that protection provided for by the Jones Act. At the end of 18 months of inaction, with our shipping falling steadily back, as compared with the fleets of other nations, it is indicated that full enforcement of the Jones Act provisions may not be advisable. If the provisions are not enforceable, some substitute must be found which will save our shipping from destruction. But it must be found speedily or it will no longer be necessary to ask what is wrong with our merchant marine. For there will be no merchant marine worthy of the name, and our billions of dollars and our hopes of ranking as a sea power commensurately with our rank in every other respect among the nations of the world will have been sunk beyond all recovery.

OUR MERCHANT MARINE MUST BE SAVED.

As a Member of the United States Senate and a Democrat from the far South I say unequivocally that it is the bounden duty of Congress to pass whatever laws are necessary to foster, upbuild, and protect our American shipping. If the Jones Act will not suffice in its present form, let us amend it. If we can not enforce the provisions of that act for preferential rail rates on shipments in American vessels, and discriminating duties in favor of imports in American ships, and discriminating tonnage dues on foreign vessels, then in heaven's name let us devise some means that will as well accomplish the end desired, and I for one shall support it to the best of my ability even though it be a direct subsidy or, in the euphonious language of our Britsh cousins, "A postal or admiralty subvention." We must keep our ships afloat. The cost does not matter.

In this effort we will have the cordial support of President Harding and the Shipping Board, and the temper of Congress is right to do its part whenever clearly shown what is required. The President said in a speech at Marion last year, "I want to promise you that one of the first acts of the incoming administration will be to unfurl the flag on all the paths of the seas." President Harding meant what he said, and I am sure that he is going to do his full part in this great work.

I have conferred several times with the Shipping Board, especially Chairman Lasker, and have the strongest assurance that the board is doing and will continue to do everything in its power to make a success of its gigantic task. We must be patient with the board. Harsh criticism does no good, but constructive advice presented in a kindly way will be welcomed by the board and be of material assistance.

THE SHIPPING SITUATION SUMMARIZED.

1. Our country owns over a billion dollars' worth of Government ships, the bulk of which compares favorably with any shipping on earth.

2. It is not possible for the Shipping Board to dispose of this fleet to private persons in the near future, as there are no purchasers.

3. The Shipping Board must do the best it can with this vast property belonging to all the people of America, and all the people must help.

4. Our exporters, importers, and travelers, and especially our big railroad systems, should patronize American vessels; and if any preference in freights and rates is to be given, it should be to American ships.

5. Government officials and their families, and Government commerce, should never sail on foreign ships except in emergencies.

6. Knowledge and love of the sea should be inculcated among our people, and they should be encouraged to interest themselves intelligently and helpfully in whatever pertains to the sea.

7. We have built, and can continue to build, as good ships as any other nation and with greater rapidity.

8. Our private companies operate ships, in spite of higher wages paid to labor, in successful competition with the world because of their greater efficiency.

9. Never again should our Navy and our commerce be at the mercy of foreign vessels as they were at the outbreak of the World War.

10. At least one acid test of genuine American patriotism should be to use our own ships, to stand by our own bottoms.

11. As commerce follows the flag, and it is our wish to trade with all the world, we should, in the language of the President, "unfurl our flag"—our glorious Stars and Stripes—over American ships, manned by American seamen, carrying American goods "on all the paths of the seas."

AMENDMENTS OF TAX REVISION BILL.

Mr. SPENCER, Mr. SMOOT, and Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN submitted amendments intended to be proposed by them to House bill 8245, the tax revision bill, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 8442) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," approved March 12, 1914, as amended, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Possessions.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, when the Senate took a recess last evening it was considering an amendment which I introduced. It will be found, not printed separately, but on page 7991 of the RECORD.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I would like to state, so that we may not get confused in the consideration of the bill, that there was another section which had been reopened for an amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. It is still open, after the vote by which it was adopted had been reconsidered, and I wish we could dispose of that particular amendment and that particular section before we take up the amendment of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from North Dakota is correct, and I think I should yield at this time for various reasons, particularly because the amendment the Senator speaks of is technically and parliamentarily in order, while mine will be the next one. So I yield the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thank the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment referred to by the Senator from North Dakota.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment which was reconsidered begins on page 239, line 20, the paragraph beginning "Capital stock issued."

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I want to modify the amendment to the amendment which I offered on yesterday as follows: At the end of line 4, on page 240, after the word "thereof" and before the period, insert a comma and the following:

Or unless the actual value is less than $100 per share, in which case the tax shall be 1 cent on each $20 of actual value or fraction thereof.

Mr. President, I have changed my amendment to the amendment to meet the objection that it would be difficult, if not impossible, for the revenue officers to carry it out under the form in which it was originally introduced. I have followed the method which applies to nonpar value stocks in excess of $100.

The provision with regard to nonpar value stocks that are over $100, as the committee reported it, is that they shall pay 5 cents on each $100 or fraction thereof. In other words, if the actual value of a nonpar value stock is $110, it will pay 10 cents; in other words, the fraction over $100 is counted as though it was another $100. That takes care of nonpar value stocks that are in excess of $100.

There is no provision in the amendment to take care of the nonpar value stocks that are actually less than $100, and I have attempted to take care of that in this way: You may have a 1-cent stamp. If the nonpar value stock is less than $20, then the tax on it is 1 cent. If it is over $20 and less than $40, the tax is 2 cents. If it is over $40 and less than $60, the tax is 3 cents. If it is over $60 and less than $80, it is 4 cents; and, of course, if it is $100, then it is 5 cents.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, from the examination I have been able to give to it in the little time I have had to consider the effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Nevada I can see no serious objection to it, and therefore, as far as I personally can, I accept the amendment.

Mr. PITTMAN. I thank the Senator. I am sure the Senator will understand I do not want it agreed to just pro forma. I do not offer it in that way, and I hope there will be a sufficient understanding of my purpose and the accomplishment of the amendment so that it will not be treated as a pro forma amendment in conference.

I realize that the committee in their desire for haste in passing the bill have a right to do these things, but I wish to call attention of the Senator in charge of the bill to this fact. I have letters here to support my statement, but I shall not take time to read them. As we know, it was customary in this country, and has been at nearly all times in the past, to organize corporations with what they call a par value to the stock. That par value to the stock is an arbitrary value placed upon it by the men who incorporate the company. They say there shall be a million shares of stock and that those shares shall have a par value of $100 per share. Apparently, therefore, the corporation is worth $100,000,000. We know, as a matter of fact, the fictitious value, the arbitrary value, given to the stock in the corporation of the company amounted to nothing. There is not one case out of a thousand in the organization of a company in which the actual value of the share is anywhere near the nominal or fictitious value that is given it.

I have often thought that possibly the law, where it was capable of being enforced or rather enacted by Congress, should prevent these fictitious values being given to shares of stock. There is no doubt that the great buying public, when they read that the par value of a share of stock is $100 and see it offered for $50, think it is a bargain. I can conceive of no purpose whatsoever other than deception in organizing a corporation with a fictitious value on the stock.

It is now becoming customary to organize corporations where the capital stock is simply divided into shares, in which there is no value given to the shares whatever. The shares are simply utilized for the purpose of dividing the interest in the corporation. I have letters here from incorporating companies of the country which represent as agents various new corporations in the various States, in which I am told that there are a great many corporations organized under the laws of States which permit the organization of corporations without a nominal or par value of stock for the purpose of promoting colonization schemes, private irrigation schemes throughout the West, the development of leasing properties under the recent oil leasing law; in other words, those corporations are organized with the realization that there is no definite value at the time the corporation is organized, and therefore they can give no value to it. They are not organized for the purpose of taking over a property that already has a value. They are organized for the purpose of dividing the shares in making something valuable.

There are a number of these corporations which have been organized, we will say, for 1,000,000 shares. Those shares have commenced to sell for $1 a share, but they have had to stop issuing those shares under this law. Why is that? It is because the tax they will have to pay on the issuance of shares that are now selling for $1 will cost them as much as it would cost to issue a share that is actually worth and selling for $100. In other words, a million-share corporation is organized for the purpose of cooperative development of a private irrigation plant in the West, and what is the result? They will have to pay $50,000 to issue the stock originally in that corporation.

The injustice of that is apparent to everyone. As a matter of fact, they ought to pay just one one-hundredth of what a $100 share pays, but it has been called to my attention that it would be almost impossible of execution if the provision of law were put in that form. Consequently, instead of putting it in that form, I have now put it in the form which provides that the lowest denomination of stamp shall be 1 cent. We can get stamps of that denomination, of course. I then provide that below the sum of $100 there are simply four divisions, and above $100 only one division. In other words, we would pay 5 cents on a $100 share, and if it is over $100 we would pay 10 cents. Below $100 I have divided it into four divisions. If it is less than $100 in actual division, then on each $20 worth or fraction thereof one would pay 1 cent. That is plain and it is very simple. If the stock is worth $1, it is treated just as though it was worth $20, and there is a 1 cent stamp put on the stock certificate. If it is worth $21, a 2 cent stamp is placed on the certificate, just as though it was worth $40, and so on.

The only objection to it would be the objection of administration of the law, and I can not conceive that there can be much difficulty in the administration of it when it is divided broadly only in that small number of zones and limiting it to stamps of a specified amount, the lowest value of stamp being 1 cent and then running up to 5 cents.

I have presented the matter as clearly as I can, because I have received so many communications with regard to the injustice of the tax now applicable, and urging that it is preventing the operation of those companies that have already been organized. I therefore hope that the acting chairman, when the matter does come up in conference, it being a new proposition entirely and not having been presented before to either House, will have in mind at least the argument that I have presented on behalf of the amendment in the form in which I now have it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask for a vote on the Senator's amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, just prior to recess last evening I introduced an amendment which will be found on pages 7991 and 7992 of the RECORD of yesterday's proceedings. I will ask the Secretary to read the same, as there are some Senators present now who were not in the Chamber when the amendment was read last night.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Insert at the end of the bill in the proper place under a new title the following:

That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is hereby authorized to provide additional hospital and out-patient dispensary facilities for persons who served in the World War and are patients of the United States Veterans' Bureau, by construction on sites now owned by the Government or on sites to be acquired by purchase, condemnation, gift, or otherwise, such hospitals and out-patient dispensary facilities to include the necessary buildings and auxiliary structures, mechanical equipment, approach work, roads, and trackage facilities leading thereto, vehicles, live stock, furniture, equipment, and accessories, and also to provide accommodations for officers, nurses, and attending personnel, and the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is authorized to accept gifts or donations for any of the purposes named therein. Such hospital plants shall be of fireproof construction, and the location and nature thereof, whether for the treatment of tuberculous, neuropsychiatric, or general medical and surgical cases, shall be in the discretion of the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau.

That for carrying into effect the preceding paragraph relating to additional hospital facilities there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $16,000,000, to be immediately available and to remain available until expended.

That the Director of the United States Veterans' Bureau is hereby authorized and directed to turn over from the money authorized to be appropriated in the preceding paragraph a sum not to exceed $500,000 to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall use such moneys for extending the facilities of United States Public Health Service Hospital No. 32, Washington, D. C., by constructing such additional buildings as are necessary to make the same an equipped 400-bed hospital, such additional construction to include one ward building and quarters for necessary personnel, and such miscellaneous work, including improvement of the grounds, as may be necessary, and to acquire such additional land adjoining the hospital as may be necessary for this development: Provided, however, That not to exceed $50,000 of the said $500,000 shall be used in the acquisition of such additional land.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, as I said last night, and as far as possible I wish to avoid repeating the same argument presented already, I was prompted to offer this amendment because, as Senators will perceive by consulting the RECORD, I received a telegram from the governor of Arizona advising me that there should be an immediate expansion and increase in hospital facilities and vocational-training centers in Arizona in order properly to care for the ex-service men who are coming to Arizona. I immediately consulted with Director Forbes, of the Veterans' Bureau, in whose judgment I place reliance. Director Forbes, of the Veterans' Bureau, told me that the governor of Arizona had not misstated nor overstated the emergency existing there.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. ASHURST. With pleasure.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona contain the same provisions that are contained in a bill pending in the House which is said to have the approval and support of the Director of the Veterans' Bureau?

Mr. ASHURST. To the Senator's question I reply yes. The amendment which I proposed is a rescript of a bill introduced in the House by Representative LANGLEY and which was referred to the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It will be remembered that an emergency arose last winter and an appropriation of $18,600,000 was made to authorize the Public Health Service to erect additional hospitals and to acquire by purchase or otherwise sites for the erection of hospitals.

While Congress at that time nobly responded to the then existing emergency, it has been ascertained that this emergency now exists, that ex-service men are without proper hospital facilities, that they are without adequate vocational training centers, hence I am asking Congress again to make proper response.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Does the Senator from Arizona recollect the date when the $18,000,000 appropriation became available?

Mr. ASHURST. The bill was approved on March 4, 1921, and the money became immediately available.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That being the case, the Senator realizes how much time has elapsed since that money became available. Of course, it became available at the time the act was signed.

Mr. ASHURST. That is true.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I have not heard all of the Senator's remarks this morning, but I understand they have been to the effect that there is still great need of hospital facilities for the hospitalization of soldiers. I should like to take occasion——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POINDEXTER. To state that in some instances, at least, the money that was appropriated last March has not been used for the purposes for which it was appropriated. I remember in one case at Walla Walla, in my State, that provision was made for the conversion of an abandoned military post there into a hospital. That has not yet been done.

As the Senator has stated, it was an emergency that called for that appropriation, and there being an emergency, one would think that it would call for immediate action and for some measure of speed in completing the work in hand; yet apparently it has been proceeded with with that spirit of deliberation which ordinarily characterizes the Government bureaus, proceeding on the theory that they have got all time at their disposal within which to do the work that comes before them from day to day.

I made some inquiry of the Public Health Service as to the cause of delay, and was referred to the Supervising Architect of the Treasury Department. The Supervising Architect said that there had been delay in getting the plans from the Public Health Service, and completed the architectural drawings after they had obtained the plans from the Public Health Service. So apparently there has been very gross neglect in carrying out the terms of the act. Somebody, in my opinion, in failing to act promptly and expeditiously, has been very negligent.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, let me at this juncture again request that the Secretary read again the telegram from the governor of Arizona, as some Senators are present now who were not present last night. The governor of Arizona is accurate in his expressions and is a man of excellent judgment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

PHOENIX, ARIZ, October 17, 1921.

Senator HENRY F. ASHURST,
Washington, D. C.:

Director Forbes of Veterans' Bureau has submitted report to President strongly urging immediate action to meet present emergency arising from needs of hundreds of disabled former service men who, with approach of winter, are pouring into Arizona, where facilities for their care are very inadequate. He recommends immediate completion of Whipple building program through letting of contracts, it being obvious that under system now in effect winter will be well over before any of the buildings now under construction will be ready for occupancy. Maj. Louis T. Grant, manager Veterans' Bureau, twelfth district, is now in Washington, and I therefore urge that Arizona congressional delegation take prompt action, conferring with Maj. Grant and Director Forbes and calling on the President, bringing strongly to his attention the desperate situation in which these men find themselves and pointing out necessity for immediate action along following lines: Speeding up of construction program at Whipple, establishment of vocational-training center at Prescott, acquirement of additional hospital facilities at Phoenix, and construction of cottages at Tucson to accommodate approximately 300 more patients. The need is very real, and I urgently bespeak your hearty cooperation.

THOMAS E. CAMPBELL,
Governor.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. KING. In conversation this morning with Col. Patterson, of the War Risk Bureau, I was advised by him that there were more than 300 vacant beds at the San Diego hospital. I understood from him that there were other hospitals under the control of the Government, provided for the care of ex-service men, which were also available. Recently we were told, and it was published quite extensively, that one hospital in Chicago had several hundred beds; indeed, as I recall, approximately 2,000 beds, and that there were only five patients there.

I was wondering if the Senator from Arizona had made an investigation as to the extent there were available beds in the various hospitals under the control of the Government, and what disposition has been made of the large appropriation which was made some time ago and referred to by the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Utah asks me two questions, and I will try as briefly as I may to answer both of them.

Mr. KING. I did so in order to avoid unduly delaying the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. The first inquiry propounded is as to the information I have concerning the report that there are vacant beds in the San Diego hospital. As to the situation in San Diego, I know nothing. My information concerning the situation in Arizona comes from the following sources, namely: From letters I have received from Arizona; from the telegram of the governor of Arizona; from Maj. Louis T. Grant, manager Veterans' Bureau, twelfth district; from Director Forbes; from the public press of my State; and from the chambers of commerce at Tucson, Phoenix, and Prescott.

These, Senators, constitute the source of my information. If I may not rely upon Director Forbes and the governor of my State and the press of the State accurately to state the situation, upon whom may I rely?

The Senator from Utah propounded the further very pertinent inquiry to me as to what has become of and how have the $18,600,000 which were appropriated last March for hospitalization been absorbed. It will be remembered that last winter many Senators believed, as the Surgeon General himself believed, that $22,000,000 were necessary, instead of $18,600,000, properly to care for the sick soldiers; but Congress, exercising its right and having in front of it the duty to be economical, saw fit to appropriate $18,600,000. All of that sum has either been spent or is already allocated or contracted to be expended.

Immediately upon assuming his office on the 5th of March, 1921, I believe that one of the first things the Secretary of the Treasury did, if not the first, was to appoint a committee called the Board of Consultants to make investigations and ascertain where United States Public Health hospitals should be located, and the $18,600,000 has been expended or allocated under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has acted upon the reports made to him by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and by the Board of Consultants. All of that money has been spent or allocated, and hence no money is available for further expansion of hospitalization or vocational-training centers unless and until this appropriation is made. I hope I have answered the question.

Mr. WARREN and Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ASHURST. I think the Senator from Wyoming rose first, and I yield first to him.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, what information has the Senator that this money has all been expended or will shortly be expended?

Mr. ASHURST. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. WARREN. What information has the Senator as to the expenditure of the $18,600,000?

Mr. ASHURST. I have been advised—and I am sure it was not confidential—by the board of consultants that all of the $18,600,000 has either been expended or, to use a new word that has come into our vernacular, has been "allocated"—that is to say, distributed and assigned to particular places—and hence no sums out of that $18,600,000 are available.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say to the Senator that——

Mr. ASHURST. I have no knowledge that any of this money was wasted; but I join with the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] in pointing out that some unnecessary delays, and in some instances delays that were apparently necessary, have taken place. I am not making any charges that even one dollar of this money was frittered away or improperly spent; I am merely calling attention to the fact that a situation has arisen whereby many of the millions of men whom we called to the colors require and are entitled to hospitalization and vocational training, and that Director Forbes of the Veterans' Bureau says that further moneys are necessary. Now I yield further to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, my information is not in accord with that of the Senator. There is quite a sum which as yet has not been allocated, as I have been informed. Furthermore, it is useless to authorize an expenditure without following it up with an appropriation. There will be an appropriation bill presented very soon after the present bills which have been given promised preference shall have been passed. There will be more than $100,000,000 carried by that bill for disabled veterans, and if there is a shortage in the matter of hospitalization we shall certainly expect notification of that fact, and provision will be made, of course, in the bill.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator, I know, is so diligent in his attendance upon the Senate that he could not have overlooked the reading of the telegram from the governor of Arizona, who says that unless an emergency appropriation is made winter will have passed before the work is begun.

Mr. WARREN. With all due respect to the governor of the State, he naturally can not have quite as complete information as the Secretary of the Treasury would have or, for instance, the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, which is preparing the estimates for us to take up almost immediately in the deficiency bill to which I have referred.

Mr. ASHURST. I repeat that the responsible authorities charged with this particular work under the Secretary of the Treasury, to wit, the White committee, to wit, Director Forbes, have stated——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. And the Senate investigating committee appointed to investigate the relief bureaus caring for incapacitated soldiers.

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; and the committee of the Senate, composed of five Senators, are unanimously of the opinion that this emergency appropriation should be provided. Now, for my friend the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. WARREN] dogmatically to say that the money has not been spent and that money is available, I submit—respectfully, of course—is no answer to the proofs I have submitted.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator tell us where any large proportion of the $18,600,000 has been expended?

Mr. ASHURST. Six hundred thousand dollars was spent in Whipple Barracks, Ariz.—a comparatively small sum.

Mr. WARREN. It was very well spent, too, I think.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well spent; yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator will pardon me, I think I can enlighten the Senator from Wyoming. It is my understanding, and the understanding of our committee—that is, the committee that has been investigating the agencies for rehabilitating our soldiers——

Mr. ASHURST. The Senate committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senate investigating committee—that all of that money has been contracted for and is being expended, and that the Treasury Department board of hospital consultants have indicated the need in the immediate future of further appropriations for hospital facilities. The very first recommendation of the special investigating Senate committee, of which I have the honor to be a member, is as follows:

> That the Director of Veterans' Bureau be authorized to provide additional hospitals according to the recommendations of the board of consultants at a cost of $16,400,000 and that an appropriation of that amount be made available without delay.

I do not think there is any doubt at all but that practically all of the $18,000,000 is under contract for expenditure at the present time. One of the things that the committee was very diligent about was to encourage that committee to prompt action, so as to start at once the erection of more hospitals. The very first paragraph in our committee report under "Hospitalization" refers to the earlier appropriations and the long delay in the work of erecting hospitals. I think I ought to read that to the Senate at this stage.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts (reading):

> There has been a failure to provide adequately for the special problems of tuberculosis and neuro-psychiatry, which together now constitute two-thirds of the load. On August 1, 1921—

That is, this year—

> Not a single new hospital had been completed (the Speedway Hospital at Chicago was opened shortly afterwards) although the first $9,000,000 appropriation was made in March, 1919, and although the need of new hospitals and sanatoria, particularly for tuberculosis and mental cases, has been evident for at least three years.

Mr. WARREN. That does not seem to be due to a lack of appropriations. They have not expended the money.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I must say that it was our judgment that there was not only a great and terrible neglect in expediting the expenditure of this money for hospitals, but in our report we charge Congress itself with very serious neglect later in the matter of delaying appropriations. It appeared before our committee that the Secretary of the Treasury as early as December, 1919, asked for a large appropriation of money for hospital purposes—H. Doc. No. 481—and a request was made for $85,000,000 for hospital purposes, and not a dollar was appropriated until March of this year—one year and three months after the medical authorities of the Public Health Service had called attention to the need of 23,400 beds within two years.

Mr. President, I am sorry to have to make that reflection upon Congress, but the cold facts are that Congress itself was indifferent to the need and exceedingly slow in appropriating money for this purpose. The only justification for the delay that I have ever heard was that Congress wanted to know what was being done with the $9,000,000 that had been appropriated in March, 1919, and that $9,000,000 brought no results for three years, namely, since August last of this year. There was not a hospital erected or a bed in use for a soldier in August of this year from the $9,000,000 that had been appropriated three years before, and one of the things that our committee did, for which I think it deserves some credit, was its insistence that this $18,000,000 appropriated in March of this year be at once contracted for and expended. We called before us the committee headed by Dr. White; we called before us the supervising architects, and we demanded that they prepare the plans and let the contracts and spend the money necessary to start the building of these hospitals. There is, however, another step—we must appropriate more money for more hospitals. The Director of the War Risk Bureau, as the Senator from Arizona has pointed out, the so-called White committee, and our investigating committee, are of the opinion that now there must be appropriated $16,000,000 more in order to complete this long-neglected work.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for that statement.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, who makes the statement that $16,000,000 more should be appropriated at once?

Mr. ASHURST. Just a moment, Mr. President. I have the floor.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Senator to yield further. Perhaps he has more information than I have.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to say, in this matter of appropriations, that appropriations have been made just as fast as they were properly called for. If the Congress is at fault, of course, we are all at fault; but in this late matter of the $18,500,000 very little of it has been expended so far. In fact, the one place which the Senator has mentioned has perhaps received a larger expenditure than any other place. This money is being expended. Of course, we can not expect to appropriate to-day and have a hospital built in some corner to-morrow.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator is too acute a man to believe that I have attempted or that I am attempting to reflect on him or his committee.

Now I yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], who has been on his feet for some time.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want the Senator to allow me to suggest to him and to try most earnestly to impress upon the Senate that this is not an omnibus general legislation bill to which can be atached all matters of general legislation. It is a revenue bill pure and simple. It has only one purpose, and that is to raise revenue. It is not an appropriation bill. Its function is not to determine where the money shall go. Now, the Senator—and I am going to speak directly in the interest of his bill——

Mr. ASHURST. I am listening.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator proposes to attach this general legislation to this bill. In my candid opinion, he is delaying just what he wants. Remember, first, that even if you could attach general legislation to a revenue bill the chances are a thousand to one that the conferees could never hold it in the bill; and remember, secondly, that when this bill gets into conference we shall have to go over the whole bill again from A to Z. That is going to take some little time. In the meantime, such a meritorious measure as is suggested by the Senator, calling so imperatively for speedy action, could be passed in the House and the Senate forty times while this committee is considering a conference bill.

That being the case, suppose we can get through with this bill in two days. Let the House pass the other bill or let the Senate pass it as a separate proposition. You can send it right over immediately and have it voted upon.

Let me suggest to the Senator another thing:

The Senator thinks it is imperative, in order to take care of this overflow, that work be immediately done. It is going to take some time, even if the Senator's bill goes through, to construct these hospitals and hurry them up to completion. The Indian Department has just abandoned one of the fine schools in Minnesota, on Cass Lake, known as the Mission School. It is now vacant. It has, I think, about 100 beds, all ready. It is in a most beautiful location among the pine trees upon one of the most beautiful lakes in that State. It can be leased to the War Department or to any department having charge of hospitals, and it can be leased to-morrow, and it will take care of 100 patients. Among those pines is the best place in the world for those who have been gassed or who have tubercular troubles.

I am not saying that there is a necessity for that; but above all, I hope we can go on with this bill and not attempt to make it a general legislative bill. I am certain that we are delaying even what the Senator wants by attempting to attach that bill to this one, thereby delaying action upon a bill which can be made a law ten times over while we are in conference on this.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I want to suggest that it was stated by the chairman of the Appropriations Committee that there will be a deficiency appropriation bill within a week or two, and this bill I think will properly come on that bill as an amendment. I therefore suggest to the Senator that he withdraw his amendment and offer it to that bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have listened closely to the words of wisdom from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and the observations, doubtless wise, made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS]. I do not want Senators now to think I am going to take the attitude of trying to capitulate with them. Nothing is further from my view. I am not seeking—and it would be improper were I to seek—to extract any such thing as a promise that they will do this or that; but the importance of this matter can not be overestimated. It may be true that a special bill could pass Congress before this tax bill could become a law. Now, I am going to lay this proposition before the Senate; I am willing to withdraw this amendment. I do it reluctantly; but, yielding to the opinions of Senators who are noted for wisdom and success in legislation, being advised that a deficiency appropriation bill will be before the Senate within a month or two months—I ask the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, if I am correct in the assumption that there will soon be a deficiency bill?

Mr. WARREN. I am so informed by the head of the budget, that the bill has been in preparation for some weeks.

Mr. ASHURST. Very well. I am going to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, the Senator from Wyoming, if he will call before his Committee on Appropriations Maj. Lewis T. Grant, manager veterans' bureau, twelfth district, and Col. Forbes, the director of the United States Veterans' Bureau, and other officials and proper witnesses, so that all facts may be learned and that a grateful Republic may, as far as money and science permit, show its gratitude toward those who carried to new and greater glory our victorious standards and who passed bravely through the iron storm of war, but who returned broken in health or are seeking opportunity to learn a trade.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wyoming how long it has been since subordinate officials in the executive departments of the Government determined when an appropriation bill would be put through the Congress? My understanding was that under the Constitution the appropriation of the money of the people was made by Congress and not by some subordinate official or deputy of a subordinate in one of the executive departments.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator very well knows that under the Constitution the Congress shall be advised of the wants of the Government, and certain estimates have to come before Congress. Congress can do as it chooses with them or without them.

Congress saw fit almost unanimously, certainly not with my advice—I do not know what the Senator's was—to pass a budget bill. In that budget they have arranged that these estimates, instead of coming from the Secretary of the Treasury, as formerly, shall come from the President of the United States.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That does not make any difference whatever in the status of those estimates when they come before Congress. They occupy exactly the same status that they have always occupied; and Congress ever since there has been a Congress, practically, has been engaged in the business of cutting down those estimates and appropriating millions of dollars less than was asked for in the estimates.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. What attracted my attention was the reply of the Senator from Wyoming, the chairman of the great Appropriations Committee of the Senate, to the inquiry of the Senator from Arizona as to whether or not there was going to be a deficiency appropriation bill introduced, to the effect that he was informed by the Director of the Budget that there would be one introduced.

Mr. WARREN. I will say to the Senator that in his serious objections to relinquishing any of the rights of the Senate, I join him; but I alluded to that as a matter of fact, that we used to frame those bills upon the wants of the various departments as they have been ascertained. The quickest way we can find out what the shortages are is to make it requisite of the departments that they shall all report and that they shall come through some one channel—formerly the Secretary of the Treasury, now the President—upon which reports the Congress can accept their statements, and then cut out or add to and pass or not pass as the Congress may conclude to do.

Mr. LODGE. The matter of estimates is governed by statute. The Constitution contains nothing about estimates. Our power is absolute.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I want to bring this debate to a close, and I do not mean to be offensive when I say that I shall see to it that this matter "is not a flash in the pan."

Too often when abuses are brought to the attention of Congress and an investigation held, on a promise that they will be corrected by the Congress the promise is not lived up to. I do not want a "flash in the pan" in this matter. If the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations will assure me here or elsewhere that an emergency bill or a deficiency bill will come before the Senate within a month or so, and that his committee will call the Director of the Veterans' Bureau and Dr. Grant and Dr. White, the latter the chairman of the board of consultants, and will give this important subject their attention, I will be content.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I would like to call the attention of the Senator from Arizona and other Senators as well to the report which was a few days ago placed on the desk of every Senator. Ten pages of that report are devoted to the question of hospitalization, and I am sure the Committee on Appropriations, after reading that part of this report, will lose no time in appropriating the money necessary to provide proper hospital facilities for every incapacitated veteran in this country.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe that.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, the hospitalization of our soldiers is a story of procrastination, of delay, of neglect that is disgraceful to our national honor. The delay in the expenditure of the money appropriated, the delay in appropriating the money, the delay in appreciating the needs of hospitals for our soldiers is a sad and pathetic story of indifference and incompetency. This question forms the main portion of our report. It traces every effort made by our officials to get the money necessary for this purpose. Let me read extracts from this report, No. 233, which the able Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND] made to the Senate from the committee investigating relief bureaus:

HOSPITALIZATION.

There is no doubt that there has been a lamentable failure on the part of the Government to provide adequate hospital facilities for the wounded, sick, and disabled veterans of the World War. The men have been cared for in many places in temporary, badly constructed, and nonfireproof buildings of the war-camp type, poorly located, which should never have been used for other than temporary purposes. Thousands of men are still receiving hospital treatment in such places. There has been a failure to provide adequately for the special problems of tuberculosis and neuropsychiatry, which together now constitute two-thirds of the load. On August 1, 1921, not a single new hospital had been completed (the Speedway Hospital at Chicago was opened shortly afterwards), although the first $9,000,000 appropriation was made in March, 1919, and although the need of new hospitals and sanatoria, particularly for tuberculosis and mental cases, has been evident for at least three years. The use of the miserable war-shack structures and the large use of contract hospitals has resulted in denying to thousands of men the careful, adequate, and efficient hospitalization to which they were and are entitled. There were delays in making the appropriation, delays in the Supervising Architect's Office, delays on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury in making the contracts, and delays in the construction of the hospitals. One of the locations was found to be impossible and had to be abandoned.

The location of the hospitals taken over by the Public Health Service, particularly the war-camp buildings of the War Department, and the lack of sufficient tubercular and mental hospitals properly located near the centers of population, has produced a system of transfers of patients which has been of great detriment and expense. The knowledge of the Government's failure has prevented men who required hospitalization from seeking it until too late, and a stream of dying patients beyond the possibility of cure is in part the result thereof. Moreover, the administration of such hospitals as were available has, in some respects, been defective. The lack of inspection for venereal disease, the failure to prevent the use of drugs and liquor in hospitals, and the lack of discipline have all had their evil effect.

The attempt to hospitalize disabled war veterans at a place like Fort McHenry, Md., with its lack of sanitary arrangements, its foul odors, its uninviting location, and its shack buildings, is a disgraceful incident.

The sad truth is that instead of receiving that tender and efficient care to which they were entitled, many unfortunate disabled veterans have been treated shabbily and abominably.

The total number of admissions of war-risk insurance patients in all Government and private hospitals amounted in July, 1919, to 10,000; in July, 1920, to 60,000; and in June, 1921, to nearly 150,000 (this includes many transients, duplications, and short-term cases); while the number in such hospitals on the three dates were, respectively, 5,000, 18,000, and 27,000. See Table G, attached, giving figures by months. Of the last number, over 10,000 were tuberculosis cases, about 7,000 mental cases, and the balance general and surgical. See Tables H and I, attached. Figures by branches of service, giving numbers in each hospital and totals by districts for private hospitals as of July 7, 1921, are given in Tables J and K, attached.

In order to avoid in the future the mistakes and injustices of the past, it is necessary to trace the development of hospitalization and to present the present situation, showing the necessity for the recommendations which the committee makes.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to read further from this report. I urge all Senators to read the further discussion of this subject on pages 8 to 18.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I thank the Senator, and now in withdrawing the amendment for the present, I ask leave at the appropriate time to-day to introduce a bill which will be exactly the same as the amendment I offered to this bill.

Mr. OVERMAN. I suggest that the Senator offer an amendment to the deficiency bill. That is the way to bring that up.

Mr. ASHURST. There is no deficiency bill pending.

Mr. OVERMAN. There will be.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator for the observation, but I believe I will introduce the bill.

If I may have that permission to so introduce the bill and withdraw this amendment I will yield the floor.

Mr. SMOOT obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the amendment has not been withdrawn yet, and perhaps the Senator from Utah will yield for that purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona withdraws his amendment, and the consent given for a vote upon his amendment is rescinded.

Mr. ASHURST. Have I permission to introduce the bill at my convenience this afternoon?

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator can introduce his bill at any time.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to offer certain amendments, and ask that the Chair be not required to put a request for unanimous consent to reconsider amendments which may have been already adopted. I will state my reason for the request. In the House text of the bill there appear in 22 places the words "foreign trader." In all the amendments offered by the Senate committee to the House text it was proposed to strike those words out; but in the House text there are 22 places, other than the one that was stricken out on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin, where those exact words appear. Therefore, as to the amendments to which I have just referred, in order to perfect the bill by reason of changes made in the foreign-trade sections, which are amendments to portions of the bill already agreed to, I ask unanimous consent that such portion of the bill shall be reconsidered for the purpose only of offering such amendments, and that after action on those amendments such portions of the bill shall be considered as agreed to without a further vote.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have conferred with the official draftsman of Congress with reference to this matter, and he has furnished me a statement showing the twenty-odd instances in which the bill would have to be amended to meet the amendments offered a few days ago. I have examined some of those, and he assures me that he has made a thorough examination, that these amendments are merely perfunctory, and that they carry out the idea of the committee. I hope the request of the Senator from Utah will be granted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent agreement, I offer an amendment to strike out, on page 37, lines 13 and 14, the words "or foreign trader" and the comma, and the following amendments. I have sent a copy of the different amendments to the desk, and I ask the clerk to read each of the amendments and that the Senate act upon them.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Page 37, lines 13 and 14, strike out "or a foreign trader" and the comma.
Page 40, line 10, strike out "or foreign trader."

On page 46, at the end of line 11, insert a new sentence as follows: "In the case of a citizen entitled to the benefits of section 262, the deductions shall be the same and shall be determined in the same manner as in the case of a nonresident alien individual."

On page 48, line 4, after the word "corporation," insert the words "other than a corporation entitled to the benefits of section 262."

Page 49, line 14, strike out "foreign trader" and insert "of a citizen entitled to the benefits of section 262."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the unanimous-consent agreement, the amendments just read by the Secretary are agreed to.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I would like to have the Secretary read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 33, line 5, after the word "whatever," strike out all the remainder of said line 5 and all of lines 6, 7, and 8 and down to and including the word "spouse" in line 9, the following words being stricken out:

Income received by any marital community shall be included in the gross income of the spouse having the management and control of such community property and shall be taxed as the income of such spouse.

Mr. BROUSSARD obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, this is a very important amendment, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	Nelson	Stanley
Borah	Heflin	New	Sterling
Brandegee	Hitchcock	Newberry	Sutherland
Broussard	Johnson	Nicholson	Swanson
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Norbeck	Townsend
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Oddie	Trammell
Capper	Kendrick	Overman	Underwood
Caraway	Kenyon	Penrose	Wadsworth
Curtis	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Dial	King	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Ernst	La Follette	Poindexter	Warren
Fernald	Lenroot	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
Fletcher	Lodge	Reed	Watson, Ind.
France	McCumber	Sheppard	Weller
Gerry	McKellar	Simmons	Williams
Gooding	McLean	Smoot	Willis
Hale	McNary	Spencer

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GOODING in the chair). Sixty-seven Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I recognize that some 8 or 10 States are interested in this amendment. It is really not of sufficient general importance, in my opinion, to take up much of the time of the Senate. It is important in the States that have something to do with it, of course, so I am going to accept the amendment and have it given careful consideration in conference.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I beg the Senator's pardon. I was being addressed by another Senator at the moment and did not hear the Senator from Pennsylvania. I understand, however, that he accepts the amendment.

Mr. PENROSE. I stated that I recognize the fact that some 8 or 10 States are interested in the Senator's amendment and that perhaps undue importance, from the point of view of the States not interested, is given to the subject. In any event the interest is there and I recognize it and I am willing to take the responsibility of accepting the amendment with the view of having it given, in entire good faith, careful consideration in the conference in order to save the time of the Senate.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Then I do not care to address the Senate on the subject if it is to be accepted and made a subject of conference.

Mr. PENROSE. As far as I am concerned, there is not a Senator from a State affected who has not seen me personally and explained the matter to me from one end to the other, and if there is any further explaining to me it would merely lead to mental confusion on my part.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I just wish to call attention to the fact——

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote! Vote!

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Very well, let the vote be taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, in order that the conferees may have before them in very brief and concise form the point at issue, together with a very brief and enlightening discussion of the subject, instead of having any speeches made so as to take up the time of the Senate, I desire to state that a very able attorney from Louisiana, Mr. Dunbar, prepared a concise and short statement elucidating the whole subject. I should like to have that statement printed in the RECORD.

Mr. RANSDELL. Is that the one prepared by Mr. Dunbar?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is.

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that it has already been printed in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I withdraw the request.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is advised the article has already been printed in the RECORD, and the Senator from New Mexico therefore withdraws his request.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD such short argument as I would have made if the amendment had not been accepted, in the hope that it may be of service to the conferees.

Mr. PENROSE. That is not necessary. Give me the argument and I will submit it to the conferees.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Very well.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, last fall I commenced the fight to have the Federal Reserve Board reduce the rediscount rate charged by the Federal reserve banks. Some time ago I introduced a resolution in the Senate requiring the Federal Reserve Board to reduce those rates. The average rediscount rate was fixed at 7 per cent. That high and burdensome rate made it impossible for the grain growers of the West, the cattlemen of the country, and the cotton producers of the South to obtain money when they needed money most. I was criticized by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of this body, Senator MCLEAN, for undertaking to bring that interest rate down. My resolution suggested that the rate be fixed at 4 per cent on loans secured by Liberty bonds and 4½ per cent on loans secured by farm paper.

In the Washington Post this morning there is an article showing that the Federal Reserve Board has reduced the rediscount rate at some of the Federal reserve banks to 5 per cent. This figure is within one-half per cent of what I asked in my resolution to be fixed on farm paper and 1 per cent of what it required on loans secured by Liberty bonds.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is not the Senator incorrect in stating that they have reduced it to 5? I understood that some of the Federal reserve banks had reduced it to 4 and some to 4½ per cent.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is true, Mr. President. I was coming to that. The rate at St. Louis and San Francisco is 4½ per cent and the rate at Richmond and Atlanta is 5 per cent. I am glad that we have succeeded in compelling some reduction in the rediscount rate at the Atlanta and Richmond reserve banks. The rate at those two banks has been reduced from 7 per cent to 5. That will help some, but conditions to-day justify a further reduction of at least 1 per cent. There are $4,000,000,000 of unused lending power in the Federal reserve banks of the country, and I submit that when the farmers of the West are selling their potatoes, corn, and cattle below the cost of production and when the farmers of the South are selling their cotton below the cost of production that it is the duty of the Government to require this governmental banking institution to provide the money and credit necessary to enable those people to obtain for their produce a price that will yield a profit.

Money is the lifeblood of business and unless it is permitted to circulate freely and in sufficient quantity the body of business will become enfeebled and impaired. If this lifeblood or circulating medium is greatly reduced in quantity, as has been the case, and its circulation weakened and hindered, business stagnation, such as we have witnessed, follows and business disaster is inevitable. To illustrate: If the cotton producer, the grain grower, and the cattleman can not obtain the money or credits necessary to handle their business in a profitable way, then financial losses and business failure are bound to come.

The higher the rediscount rate on loans at the Federal reserve banks, the higher the interest rate to the man borrowing through the local bank. It must be remembered that these loans are not made directly to the individual borrower, but they are made by the Federal reserve banks when the paper is indorsed by the local bank.

There have been many instances where the Federal Reserve Board's deflation policy would not permit the member banks of the Federal reserve banking system to have the money that they needed and desired for the purpose of supplying the local banks with the money necessary to prevent the distress and suffering that we have witnessed in the South and West. The raising of the rediscount rate which made it so hard for the South and West to obtain the money needed to save their business from ruin was a crime against legitimate business. Let me remind the Senate and the country that this same Federal Reserve Board has reduced the rediscount rate at the New York reserve bank to 4 per cent. Why is this Government banking system permitted to charge Dallas and Minneapolis in the agricultural sections 5½ per cent and the Atlanta bank in the cotton growing States 5 per cent? The speculator in New York can get all the money he wants for speculative purposes at 4 per cent, while the farmers and merchants of the cotton States are required to pay at Atlanta and Dallas 5 and 5½ per cent in order to get the money necessary to enable them to market their products so as to obtain a living profit. I do not intend that the legitimate business of agriculture, commerce, and industry in the South and West shall be oppressed by high rediscount rates, while unscrupulous market manipulators and speculators in New York are favored with all the money they want at 4 per cent. I believe in the fair and just treatment of all legitimate business and I intend to continue to demand it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment that was printed on November 1, 1921, known as the manufacturers' sales tax amendment. There have been some changes made in the bill by amendments which required me to make a few changes in the amendment which I had offered. I hope that Senators who have a copy of the amendment as it was originally printed will note the changes necessary to be made, as the amendment will now be read from the desk.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator sends his amendment to the desk, will he not allow me to offer two small amendments to the bill so that we shall have this part completed before he takes up his important matter?

Mr. SMOOT. I am glad to yield for that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. With the Senator's permission, I send to the desk the following amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 16, lines 3, 4, and 5, it is proposed to strike out the words "the amount of deductible losses not sustained in such trade or business" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

> The amount by which the deductible losses not sustained in such trade or business exceed the taxable gains or profits not derived from such trade or business.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I can explain that amendment very briefly. The House bill requires gains which are made outside the regular business to be included in the gross income, but does not allow losses which are sustained from business outside to be so deducted. The purpose of the amendment is to allow a deduction for such outside losses to the extent they exceed outside gains; in other words, one has, we will say, his regular line of business and then has a little outside business, and he may incur some loss—for instance, his house may be burned. That would be a loss, of course, outside of his business. The taxpayer is not allowed under the House bill as it now stands to deduct for losses which are incurred outside of the business. This amendment proposes to allow him to deduct the difference between his gains outside his regular business and his losses outside his regular business. Suppose, for instance, the taxpayer may have had a loss of $1,000 in his regular business but may have had a gain of $500 outside. In that case he has to deduct that gain from his $1,000 loss. Suppose he also has a loss of $500 outside—for instance, that his house has burned up, thereby incurring a loss of $500. In that instance, this amendment proposes to allow him to deduct his losses outside from his gains outside, so that the loss may be reflected in the computation of his net income.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the amendment refer only to individual incomes?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is all; it does not deal with corporations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does it deal with partnerships?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course a partnership is treated as an individual all the way through in the pending bill, but the amendment does not relate to corporations.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If a corporation has any interest outside of its ordinary business, would that have any effect?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; because the corporation pays an entirely different kind of tax; it simply pays upon a certain amount of profits, and also upon the value of its stock.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Under the bill as it now stands a corporation will pay 15 per cent tax on its profits. Suppose a corporation shall make a profit outside of its business in some way or another by some investment and shall also incur a loss?

Mr. McCUMBER. We are now considering a tax as applied to individuals.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator's amendment applies only to individuals?

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment relates only to individual losses and gains.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do I understand the Senator to say that individual losses outside of the business could only be deducted in case they exceed the profits outside?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; that is all the amendment provides.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is to say, if an individual makes $1,000 outside of his business and has a loss of $1,000 outside he could not deduct the loss?

Mr. McCUMBER. If he makes a gain outside of $1,000 and loses $1,000 outside, then of course he will have neither a gain nor a loss. At present as the bill came from the other House, if a man had a gain outside he would deduct it from any loss incurred in his regular business, so as to decrease the amount of the loss, but if he had a loss outside he could not subtract that loss from his gain outside and deduct only the difference; but this amendment would allow him to do that.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I apologize to the Senator from North Dakota, but I confess that I did not quite comprehend the significance of his explanation. Let me ask the Senator if the present law is satisfactory.

Mr. McCUMBER. The present law is not satisfactory, but what I am dealing with now is the House bill.

Mr. KING. I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the House bill is so drawn—I am not certain whether or not it is the present law—that it does not allow the deduction of the losses outside or, what is equivalent, the adding of the losses outside to the losses inside and then deducting them from the gain outside to obtain the general balance.

Mr. KING. First, it seems to me, it would be important to find out whether or not the present law is satisfactory.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is admitted that it is not satisfactory nor just to the taxpayer.

Mr. KING. Because it does not permit him to deduct losses which he has sustained from gains which he has made in his business?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will probably remember that when we had under consideration the original tax bill there was a great deal of feeling concerning what were called the gamblers in the stock market; we wanted all of the money we could get from the profits of their gambling; and we so provided; but we did not want them to deduct any of their losses in their gambling. That was the law as it then stood. Possibly that might be fair to a regular gambling establishment, but it is not fair to those who have outside of their business losses which are not gambling losses and have nothing to do with stock markets or investments in stocks for sale and resale.

Mr. KING. Of course, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota would have no application to individuals who have no business from which they derive profits but some other business from which they sustain losses?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; not as I understand the Senator's statement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is one more amendment which I desire to offer, to come in upon the same page of the bill. I send the amendment to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 16, lines 2 and 3, it is proposed to strike out "any interest received free from taxation under this title," and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

The amount by which the interest received free from taxation under this title exceeds so much of the interest paid or accrued within the taxable year on indebtedness as is not permitted to be deducted by paragraph (2), subdivision (a), of section 214 or by paragraph (2) of subdivision (a) of section 234.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment just read is very much of the same nature as the amendment previously agreed to. I can explain it very briefly.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does this amendment change in any way the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], which the Senate adopted?

Mr. McCUMBER. In regard to what?

Mr. SIMMONS. In regard to the same subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not recall exactly the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment which the Senator from Florida offered and which was accepted by the Senate provided that the exemption on account of interest on tax-free securities should only be the extent of the difference between the interest paid in borrowing the money to buy the securities and the interest actually received on the securities or bonds.

Mr. McCUMBER. If such an amendment has been agreed to, I do not know exactly where it applies, but certainly not to the paragraph to which the amendment is now offered, although it appears to be exactly the same thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is very nearly the same thing.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think it is probably the same thing.

Mr. SIMMONS. That amendment has been adopted.

Mr. McCUMBER. If that be true, with the consent of the Senate I will withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment of the Senator from Florida, which was agreed to, not only applied to individuals but to corporations as well.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well, if that is true.

Mr. TRAMMELL. It might be that the paragraph proposed to be amended by the Senator from North Dakota does need amendment. I am not informed as to that, but the Senator from Utah no doubt is informed as to that particular point.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suggest to the Senator from Florida that he look into the matter and it can be taken up later.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I will not withdraw the amendment, because I find upon inquiry that the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida does not touch the particular subject covered by the amendment offered by me.

Now, I will explain the amendment. Under the House provision a taxpayer is not allowed to deduct interest paid on money borrowed to carry tax-free securities, although under the old law such a deduction was allowed. Therefore, the taxpayer ought not to be required to include in his income interest received on such tax-free securities. The amendment I have offered makes the taxpayer include in his income only so much of such tax-free interest as exceeds the interest paid which is not deductible. I think that is perfectly fair.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if I may make an inquiry of the Senator, could the amendment be construed in any way to refer to the interest paid by corporations upon funded indebtedness?

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. KING. Of course, I know the present bill permits a deduction for interest paid upon funded indebtedness, even though that funded indebtedness is a part of the capital.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the funded indebtedness of a corporation would not be a tax-free proposition.

Mr. KING. I understand.

Mr. McCUMBER. And, therefore, the amendment I have offered would not apply to corporations at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota is agreed to.

The Secretary will now read the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The READING CLERK. On page 78, lines 23 to 25, inclusive——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, do I understand the Senator from Utah now has the floor and is going to address the Senate after the amendment has been read?

Mr. SMOOT. I have offered the amendment, and I expect to speak for a few moments following its reading.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. This is a matter of such great importance, and there is so much interest in the subject in the Senate, that I suggest the absence of a quorum in order that as many Senators as possible may hear the Senator's argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Smoot
Broussard	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Spencer

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I picked up the Washington Post this morning, and I found in bold headlines the following statement:

FORDNEY puts ban on sales tax now. Plans to adopt it at regular session in connection with soldiers' bonus bill. Plan gains Senate votes. More amendments added to revision measure. Tax on community movies eliminated.

This is an Associated Press dispatch, and the substance of it is as follows:

Deploring the effort to put a sales tax through the Senate at this time, Chairman FORDNEY, of the House Ways and Means Committee, disclosed yesterday that it was his plan to bring in a sales tax in connection with the soldier bonus bill, which he said would be reported during the coming regular session of Congress.

"We want to reserve the sales tax for the bonus bill," Mr. FORDNEY said, "and we will pass that measure soon after Congress reconvenes."

Earlier in the day Mr. FORDNEY, Representative GREEN, of Iowa, and Representative LONGWORTH, of Ohio, ranking Republicans on the Ways and Means Committee, had informed Senate leaders that under no condition would the House agree to a sales tax at this time.

The Senate will remember that about three weeks ago Mr. MONDELL, the House leader, who is the Wyoming delegation, gave notice to the country that the House would not agree to a sales tax; that he was opposed to it. There was scarcely any interest taken in the sales tax when that announcement was made, but every day since that announcement was made by the Republican leader in the House the sales tax has grown more popular in the United States, not in any one section of the country but from East to West and from North to South. In my opinion, Mr. President, at least three-fourths of all the people of the United States are in favor of some form of a sales tax.

Representative LONGWORTH came to the Chamber a little while ago, and while here informed me that he, as one of the members of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, had not made any such statement as attributed to him. I can not say whether Mr. FORDNEY made the statement or not, but it makes no difference whether he did or whether he did not. I say it would come with bad grace from any Member of the House of Representatives to give notice that the Senate can not pass any legislation it pleases, and in any form.

On October 11 I discussed the manufacturers' sales tax, going into the details of it most carefully. At this time I do not propose to repeat what I said upon that occasion, but I have a short statement to make now outlining the changes that have been made in the amendment which has just been proposed by me, providing for a manufacturers' tax, which I discussed on October 11.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator put into the RECORD this morning a statement of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House which appeared in this morning's paper. I wonder if his attention was called to the statement appearing yesterday or the day before? It is as follows:

Regardless of Senator REED'S motives, his amendment at a time when the legislative situation in the Senate smacks of a Democratic filibuster—and Senator REED is one of the chief long talkers—will undoubtedly create suspicion in the minds of the veterans of the Senator's sincerity—

FORDNEY stated:

Senator REED must know that his amendment can not, under parliamentary procedure of Congress, appropriate one penny to pay a bonus. Appropriations must emanate from the Appropriations Committees of Congress. The revenue bill, coming from the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate, can not authorize appropriations. Very early in the coming regular session of Congress the House will undoubtedly pass an adjusted compensation bill. Senator REED'S action will hinder the passage of the revenue bills, which must be disposed of before the Ways and Means Committee can consistently take up the bonus bill. As author of the adjusted compensation bill, let me ask Senator REED to end his long talks and consequent delay of the business at hand. The sooner he does this, the sooner we can get at the bonus bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From what was the Senator reading?

Mr. REED. I am reading from a statement given out by Mr. FORDNEY to the newspapers and printed broadcast over the country. I am not asking the Senator from Utah for any opinion with reference to Mr. FORDNEY'S personal criticism or opinion of me, but I wanted to ask the Senator what he thinks of the declaration that we can not amend this bill under parliamentary law and provide that a portion of the funds shall be set aside and used for a particular purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. The best way for me to answer that, Mr. President, is to say that my opinion, offhand, was that there was no question but what it could be done, but I have asked a number of the attorneys connected with the Department of Justice whether it could be done, and their opinion is that it can not be under the terms of the Constitution. I do not intend to discuss that question, because one thing I never undertake to do in this body is to discuss a question I do not know anything about.

Mr. REED. It is their opinion that, a bill being before Congress, the Senate can not say how the funds which are provided for in an amendment to that bill can be used? If the Attorney General's office has rendered an opinion of that kind we had better get a new Attorney General's office.

Mr. SMOOT. I do think, however, that that was not a very courteous statement on the part of Mr. FORDNEY, if he made it for publication.

Mr. REED. I have the statement which he gave out for publication.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Utah if Mr. FORDNEY is not in favor of the imposition of a sales tax in order to raise the money to pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation?

Mr. SMOOT. He is in favor of the sales tax, but states that now is not the time to impose it. In other words, Mr. President, the opposition to this amendment has raised objections to it, to the number of four or five, I think, and as each objection is met, and it is proven that there is nothing in it, they shift to some other objection, and now the last point raised is that it must not be adopted now, but at some time in the near future.

Mr. President, now is the time to adopt this sales tax, and I state now that if this became a part of the pending bill, there would be a restoral of confidence for the future and a relief to the people of the United States from one end of the country to the other.

As I was saying, I have already spoken at length upon the details of a manufacturers' sales tax. Now, I shall make just a brief statement, and later in the day, perhaps, or this evening, I may want to refer to some of the criticisms which no doubt will be leveled against this amendment. But I want to assure every Senator who is in the Chamber that I have studied this question from every point of view possible, with the intelligence God has given me, be it little or much, and I say now, without a moment's hesitation, that there is no provision in this amendment which can not be administered, and which will not afford relief to all tax payers and the consumers of the United States.

This amendment will eliminate from our tax system the remaining miscellaneous forms of taxation, including the tax on telegraph and telephone messages, the tax on all the nonalcoholic beverages, the admission and dues tax, the excise taxes, the stamp tax, and the many other forms of special taxes found in the pending bill.

This amendment also provides for the retention of a corporation tax reading, as follows:

SEC. 230. That in lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1918 there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax at the following rates:

(a) For the calendar year 1921, 10 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236; and

(b) For each calendar year thereafter, 15 per cent of such excess amount: Provided, however, That if the average income and war or excess-profits taxes paid by any corporation for the three years next preceding have amounted to 10 per cent or less of the average net income of the corporation for those years the tax shall be 10 per cent of such excess amount.

I can discuss that at this time if necessary, Mr. President, but I think it is plain enough for all to see that I am trying to take care of at least 160,000 corporations in the United States which did not make excess profits before the war; and if it is imposed, as this bill provides, that tax will be increased upon those corporations 50 per cent.

The necessary revenue which will be lost by these repeals I propose to make up by a 1 per cent tax on the sale of every commodity manufactured or produced when sold for consumption or used without further process of manufacture, provided the sales of any manufacturer or producer exceed $6,000 a year.

The substantive difference between this amendment and the one previously offered by me in which I suggested a 3 per cent manufacturers' tax is that whereas my earlier amendment provided for the repeal of the excess-profits tax as of January 1, 1921, I make no mention of that matter in the present amendment, but stand on the action of the Senate repealing the excess-profits tax beginning January 1, 1922.

The present amendment also differs from the earlier one, inasmuch as it provides for the retention of the capital stock tax I have just read to the Senate.

The general effect of this amendment will mean the enactment by Congress of a real revision and simplification of our tax system whereby there will be six main sources of revenue for the Government in contradistinction to the 57 varieties of taxation under which the country is now suffering.

The adoption of this amendment will mean that we will have individual and corporation income taxes, custom duties, tobacco taxes, the estate tax, and the manufacturers' tax instead of the great variety in forms of existing taxation.

In my speech on October 11 I fully covered the subject of raising the necessary revenue under a 3 per cent tax. The amendments which have since been adopted will permit merely a 1 per cent tax, which will raise the revenue to be lost through the various repeals.

I stand with the many other Senators on both sides of the Chamber, who have voiced their objections to increasing the corporation income tax to 15 per cent. There is absolutely no justification for a 50 per cent increase in taxation for the corporations which have not paid the excess-profits tax. We have acted with reference to the repeal of the excess-profits tax, and for reasons which can be fully justified, but the repeal of that tax does mean a reduction in the burden of taxation for those corporations which have earned more than 8 per cent on their invested capital, and the substitution of a flat 15 per cent tax will mean an increase in tax for all corporations which have earned less than 11 per cent upon their invested capital. In other words, the repeal of the excess-profits tax and the substitution of a straight 15 per cent tax with incorporate income means an added inequity and injustice on many corporations, which have not had profits in excess of 8 per cent.

I can see no justification whatever for removing the inequities of the excess-profits tax from one group of corporations and imposing a worse inequity upon another group of corporations in the form of a 50 per cent increase in their taxes. That is to merely transpose rather than to remove inequities. It is, therefore, my feeling that the only way that we can arrive at justice in the imposition of a corporation tax, in view of our previous action, is to retain that tax as I now propose. We certainly can not justify a 50 per cent increase for many corporations which have not enjoyed excessive profits merely for the purpose of making those corporations which have paid excess-profits tax now bear a 15 per cent tax instead of a 10 per cent tax. I am mindful also of the fact that in legislating for peace times that a flat 10 per cent tax upon corporations is about ten times the rate of taxation in the prewar period.

Further, I have no fear of the Government losing revenue by my corporation-tax proposal, since a corporation is merely the form by which individuals engage in business, and the stockholders will see to it that every cent of profits which can be withdrawn from the business will be paid over to them as individuals in the form of dividends, and so the Government will receive additional revenue through surtaxes.

Senators, I wish to say now that during the coming year, and for years to come, I predict there will be but few corporations in the United States which will make excess profits, and if they do the financial conditions will be such in the country and the demand for money such, incomes having dried up from other sources, that the stockholders of the institution or the corporation that does make a profit will require that the dividends be distributed. Where one will make more than 10 per cent, there will be a thousand that will not.

In reference to the manufacturers' and producers' tax, I went into this at considerable length in my speech on October 11. The present amendment is in substance similar to my former amendment, and what I said at that time is applicable to the present form. The present amendment provides for a 1 per cent tax instead of a 3 per cent. It exempts sales of less than $6,000 a year and it also exempts any sales by farmers as to the products of their farms. Other changes have been merely in form, as a matter of drafting.

The present amendment, both as to repeals and the operation of the manufacturers' tax, will be effective beginning January 1, 1922.

Mr. President, I felt it my duty at this time to make this brief statement to the Senate outlining the changes that were made in the manufacturers' tax since I spoke to the Senate on October 11, speaking at that time to a 3 per cent manufacturers' tax instead of as at present to a 1 per cent manufacturers' tax.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Seantor from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Utah a moment ago referred to an argument that is constantly made, that the excess-profits tax interferes with business, that if it is not eliminated it will interfere with business, and at the same time he makes the statement that there will be little or no excess-profits tax collected because there will not be any excess profits.

Mr. SMOOT. For a few years to come there will be fewer corporations make excess profits than in the past. I am quite sure of that.

Mr. POMERENE. If there will be little or no excess profits earned or accumulated, how is the present law going to seriously interfere with those men?

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator was in the Chamber the other day when I discussed the question with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CARAWAY]. If the Senator will read my speech he will find that my remarks applied to the higher brackets of the income tax and not to excess-profits taxes.

Mr. POMERENE. I am discussing now the excess-profits tax, and that is what the Senator has been discussing, and that is what he referred to just a moment ago. I realize that this is a debatable question, but I think I could be better satisfied with the conclusions which some men state if they would not give the reasons for their conclusions, because when many of them give their reasons for their conclusions they defeat their own conclusions.

It seems to me that is just what we are up against here now. In one breath we say the excess-profits tax is destroying all the initiative and will ruin business if it is continued and in the next breath we say there is no use in keeping it, because there will be nothing collected under it. I can not understand that kind of logic.

Mr. SMOOT. I have never stated there would be nothing collected under it. Let me tell the Senator some of the businesses that I think are now deterred from active production on account of the excess-profits tax, and I think it is fair that I or anyone else should make the statement and tell the Senate that there are businesses of this kind in the United States.

As far as I am concerned, I wish to say to the Senator that all hazardous business of all kinds, if they do not make more than 10 per cent, will never be entered into. What would the Senator think of a man investing in a mining corporation or, as an individual, with nothing but a mining location, spending $500, $1,000, sometimes even $1,000,000, for the discovery of ore that he thinks may be in the ground, and after the expenditure of all that money never finds a trace of gold or silver or any other valuable metal?

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment, if the Senator will allow me. If such a corporation does discover the ore that they have long sought after, what is the result? The history of mines in the United States varies. There are some very low-grade propositions that are mined to-day, such as the production of copper by the Utah Copper Co., the Verdis Copper Co. of Arizona, and some of the great companies of a similar character. Those companies take a whole mountain and transfer it from one place to another, and in the transfer extract enough copper through the handling of the ore in quantities, sometimes 30,000 tons a day, to make a profit even though the ore found is only 1.15 per cent of copper. Still, through the handling of it under the processes known to-day and in such enormous quantities there is a profit and in some cases an excess profit.

But the mines of the country, as history shows, scarcely profitably produce for longer than 10 years. I say that if there is a mine that produces uninterruptedly for 10 years, it is considered a splendid property. If they are simply to get 10 per cent, they would in the 10 years get their capital back and that is about all. The Senator from Ohio would not invest his money in such a proposition, and I do not know that he would under any circumstances, because he is a very conservative man; but there are many men who are perfectly willing to invest their money in such enterprises. Let me say to the Senator now that in my opinion if the cost of the discovery of all the precious metals in the United States was added together that cost of producing them would be $2 for every $1 that is taken from the ground. There is, however, in man that gambling spirit, as one may call it, which makes him willing to take chances, but if his profits shall be limited there will be very little prospecting in any of the western sections of the country. I am quite sure the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] will agree with me in that statement.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not think the argument of the Senator from Utah is quite fair either to himself or to me. I have not said anything about taking what corporations earn in excess of 10 per cent or 15 per cent. I recognize that there are hazardous employments; I recognize that in any legislation we may pass we ought to bear that fact in mind; but what I can not understand is this. Here an attempt is made to increase the normal corporation tax from 10 per cent to 15 per cent; in other words, we are proposing to add 50 per cent to that tax. By the addition of 50 per cent to that tax on all corporations, the Senator from Utah is bringing about the very condition of which he complains.

In my judgment, the tax on corporations ought to be graduated in proportion to the earnings. I am not saying that the old law was right, but it is a very shocking thing to me to have it said that when there is a vast number of corporations in the country which are earning less than 15 per cent we shall increase by 50 per cent the tax of corporations which are earning below 15 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. My amendment does not provide for that, I will say to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. There has been a slight modification of the Senator's amendment, which, however, came to my notice but a moment ago, and then to say that the corporations that earn the fabulous amount to which the Senator has referred shall yield no more to the Government than the poor corporation that it does its business for two or three years without profit. It may be that that is equitable, but I regret that I am unable to see it in that light.

At the same time allow me to say I wish business to prosper just as well as does any other Senator; I want to work to that end; but if we are proposing to distribute the blessings of reduced taxation to the people of the country let us distribute them equitably and let us not give all of the benefits to those corporations which are in the higher brackets.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator as to that; but the Senator from Ohio was asking me about the excess-profits tax. This proposed tax is a normal tax on net incomes that every corporation in the United States will pay no matter whether the corporation be little or big. Under existing law the tax is 10 per cent on the amount of all of the profits of the corporation.

Mr. President, I cited simply one class of business, but I could point to others. They can, however, all be covered with this one designation, and that is as being hazardous. There are a great many such concerns in the United States. England has recognized that fact in every excess-profits tax she has imposed. She never imposed a tax upon any corporation unless their average of profits for five years exceeded 8 per cent.

I was curious to know, Mr. President, what the actual facts were in regard to the corporations in this country making excess profits. I wished to know whether every year the same companies made excess profits. On an examination I find from a report by the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Government that the corporations that made excess profits in 1918 in 1919 may have incurred an actual loss. The changes which take place are remarkable. I myself was surprised to find that state of facts existing. I thought that most of the companies which were making excess profits made such profits every year; but that is not so. One year a corporation will be exceedingly prosperous; for the goods which it makes there is a demand from all over the country; it will have little expense in selling its products; it runs 24 hours a day and the overhead expense to the company is no more than if it operated 8 hours or 10 hours. Its profits, therefore, are very large. The very next year the same company may make no profits whatever.

However, I was not discussing the question of the excess-profits tax until the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] called that tax to my attention, for that matter has already been settled by the Senate, so far as the bill now stands, as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. President, if there is any question as to what the pending bill, if my proposed amendment be adopted, will raise in revenue, after striking out all of the taxes upon soft drinks, the taxes upon every kind of insurance, as provided in the bill, the excise taxes, transportation taxes of every name and nature, including the taxes on telegrams and telephone messages, on all charges for admission, on all dues, and every stamp tax which is contained in the bill—if there is any question about the matter, I shall submit to the Senate the figures; and if there is any challenge of my figures, I ask any Senator here to refer the controversy to the experts of the Treasury Department. I have no more question in my mind that the sales tax will become a part of the revenue laws of our country than that I live.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Has the Senator a statement of the amount of revenue which he expects the taxes provided for in his amendment will raise?

Mr. SMOOT. Later on, when I take up the question in detail, I intend to see that the figures go into the RECORD; but I want first to see whether there is any question raised, and then I want to answer such questions as may develop, and I want to go into detail. I desire to set forth just how the proposed amendment will operate and where the money will come from. But, Senators, do not think for a moment that I would stand upon this floor and jeopardize my position as a man who has tried, at least, to study the tax system of this country and make a statement of which I was not positive.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I think the Senator ought now to go into the details which he says he is going to put into the RECORD. We want to vote on this question before the RECORD is printed.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I am going to put them in, but at this time I simply rose to make a brief statement as to the changes which have been made in the proposed amendment. I am going to speak later upon it, and I am going to go into detail, and if there is any question raised in reference to it, then I will know just what to answer.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I did not have in mind at all controverting any information which the Senator might give to us, but, for my own information at this time, and I am sure other Senators would like it also, I should be glad if the Senator would give us a statement as to the amount of revenue which he expects to raise by his amendment in lieu of the other tax provisions which were stricken out of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That information can be stated very quickly. In answer to the Senator I will state that for the fiscal year 1922—that is, the present fiscal year, beginning on July 1, 1921, and ending on June 30, 1922—my amendment in conjunction with the bill as it is now amended, eliminating of course those provisions which are stricken out and for which my amendment is substituted, will raise $4,033,593,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I should like to know how much the Senator estimates will be derived by his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. For the last six months of the present fiscal year, because it would not go into effect until January 1, 1922, my amendment imposing a 1 per cent tax for six months would raise $126,500,000, and for the entire year, of course, it would raise just twice that amount, or $253,000,000.

Mr. POMERENE. Those figures are based upon an exemption from taxation of sales to the amount of $6,000?

Mr. SMOOT. They are based on the exemption of sales up to $6,000 and the exemption of all products of the farm of every name and nature, and with provision for only one tax and that upon the manufacturer. For the information of the Senate I wish to say now that if there were a one-half of 1 per cent general turnover tax imposed it would raise at least $400,000,000 a year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Am I correct in saying that the Senator proposes by this amendment to reduce the corporation income tax as fixed in this bill now from 15 to 10 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. No. I apprehend the Senator was out of the Chamber when the Secretary read the amendment; but for the Senate's information I will read it again.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment so provides, as I understand it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from Utah has modified his amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I will read the provision of the amendment which the Senator from North Carolina has in mind. It is as follows:

SEC. 230. That in lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1918 there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax at the following rates:

(a) For the calendar year 1921, 10 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the credits provided in section 236; and

(b) For each calendar year thereafter 15 per cent of such excess amount: Provided, however, That if the average income and war or excess-profits taxes paid by any corporation for the three years next preceding have amounted to 10 per cent or less of the average net income of the corporation for those years the tax shall be 10 per cent of such excess amount.

In other words, Mr. President, it is to take care of all of the one hundred and sixty or one hundred and seventy thousand corporations that have never made any excess profits. It provides that their tax shall be 10 per cent, and that whenever they make profits above that their tax shall be 15 per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is in keeping with the amendment proposed by me.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. President, for the fiscal year 1923 under my amendment there will be raised $3,421,343,000. The estimates of the Treasury Department, submitted to the Finance Committee, stated that for the fiscal year 1923—that is, the year beginning on July 1, 1922, and ending on June 30, 1923—the requirements of the Government would be $3,400,000,000. The amendment offered by me would not only raise the amount of money required for the present fiscal year but it would raise the amount required for the next fiscal year; and by that time I hope that we can reduce the rate from 1 per cent, because I am positive that the expenses of our Government will be at least a few hundred million dollars less than they will be for the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether he means to say that under his amendment for the fiscal year 1923 the entire $3,000,000,000 would be raised?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; I mean under the bill with my amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The statement was that under the Senator's amendment that amount would be raised.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no. Under my amendment for that year we would raise $253,000,000; that is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. And how much for 1922?

Mr. SMOOT. For the fiscal year 1922 we have only six months, because this amendment will take effect on January 1, 1922, and it is just half of that amount, or $126,500,000.

Mr. President, when I speak later upon this subject I want to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that it has been stated very often in this Chamber that the taxes should be collected from income and from profits of individuals and corporations doing business, and that only a fair proportion of the tax imposed upon the people should consist of what are known as consumption taxes.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMOOT. Just one moment. Under my amendment, if the bill passes with it, I think the amount collected from each one of the six sources of taxation will convince the Senate of the United States that the tax itself is just and reasonable and that the so-called consumption taxes constitute only a reasonable percentage of the total amount.

In other words, take, for instance, the individual income tax. Nobody is objecting to that or calling it a consumption tax.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator means the normal tax on individuals?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; and the surtax, too. That raises $900,000,000.

The corporation tax with this amendment will be at least $500,000,000.

The next source is the customs. I have estimated only $275,000,000 for customs, because Mr. McCoy wanted to make it low enough to be on the safe side. There is not any doubt but that we will collect a great deal more than that.

Then take the miscellaneous revenue, $287,643. That is from the sale of public lands and from the profits that we receive from the Federal reserve banks and that class of revenue. It can not possibly be called a consumption tax.

Take the estate tax. No one can call that a consumption tax, and I only provide here an estimate of $150,000,000.

Take the tobacco tax. Every country in the world imposes a high tax upon tobacco. In a way, it is a consumption tax, but only a limited number of the citizens of the United States pay it, and no one pays it that can not afford it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. How much is it?

Mr. SMOOT. Two hundred and fifty million dollars.

The corporation-stock tax will raise $75,000,000. That can not be called a consumption tax.

The alcohol tax will raise $105,000,000. Is not that a source from which every country in the world gets a great part of its revenue? And that, Mr. President, applies only to a very few people.

The amount that has been raised by the narcotic tax, on coca leaves and all sorts of narcotics, is $20,200,000. I cut out the most of it.

Proprietary medicines are not to be taxed in the bill; and even if the Senate had left them in, my amendment would have stricken them out.

Then the manufacturers' tax for the six months, as I say, is $126,500,000. For the year it is $253,000,000. I admit that that could be designated a consumption tax, but I stand here and say that with a tax of only 1 per cent I think over half of it will never be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just let me finish this, and then I will yield.

Mr. President, I understand that Senators have been told that we are taking the tax off of brokers and putting it on sugar and tea and coffee. Let us see if that is so; and if it is so, let us see who pays the tax.

Sugar to-day is sold by the refiners for a little less than 5 cents a pound. Take it at 5 cents a pound. A tax of 1 per cent is 5 cents on 100 pounds of sugar, or one-twentieth of 1 cent a pound. That same sugar is retailing in Washington and throughout the country at 7 cents a pound. Does any sane man believe that that sugar is going to be sold for 7 cents and one-twentieth of a cent a pound if we impose a tax of 5 cents on 100 pounds of sugar?

We are to tax tea and coffee. If there are any two items that come into the United States on which there is so wide a difference between the cost of landing in the United States and the price the consumer pays, I do not know what they are. Do you think that a tax of one one-hundredth of 1 per cent is going to make any difference to the purchaser who buys tea and coffee from a retail store? I do not; and it is on just such items as that that this tax will never reach the ultimate consumer. There are many articles that I can enumerate on which it would, and I admit that it would.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not advised as to this matter: Is there a record in any of the Government departments here showing the amount of sales of the country?

Mr. SMOOT. The manufacturers' sales?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; the manufacturers' or producers' sales.

Mr. SMOOT. There is a report from every manufacturing concern in the United States showing the amount of sales of goods manufactured in the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. Oh, I understand that. Of course, we have reports showing what the profits are; but what I am trying to get at is whether or not these reports show the gross sales.

Mr. SMOOT. The census reports show the gross sales.

Mr. POMERENE. Of every manufacturer?

Mr. SMOOT. Of every manufacturer in the United States and every class of goods. Let me tell the Senator that I asked Prof. Bullock to come to Washington after the statement was made that we would not raise sufficient revenue, and with two of the best actuaries in the United States I went to the Department of Commerce. I took the man there who has these reports in hand, and we went over the reports in detail, and we all agreed as to what would be a finished product and what would not.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I have seen in the public prints so many statements as to the amount which could be raised in this behalf that I have about come to the conclusion that I can guess as well as some of these experts. We want some exact information.

But I want to ask the Senator a further question, developing this same thought. Up in the Northwest there are great lumber companies. They manufacture their lumber and wholesale it to jobbers and dealers throughout the country. Of course, some of that is called rough lumber. Some of it could be usable for fencing, for the making of sheds, and for other purposes, without being planed and dressed. Suppose they should sell a large amount of that lumber to a dealer in Chicago and that dealer should use a part of that lumber in building sheds, storehouses, and things of that sort, and should sell the rest of it in various forms; how are we to tell, under this amendment, on what lumber the lumberman in the forests is to keep his accounts so that he may know what is ultimately consumed by his vendee and what passes on to some one else?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will read regulation 47, published by the Treasury Department, to which I referred in my speech of October 11, a copy of which I sent to the Senator, he will find exactly how it is done.

Mr. POMERENE. Can the Senator tell me in a few words how it will be done?

Mr. SMOOT. In simple words, it is done by credits; that is, the lumber that is sold from the mill is sold outright for further process of manufacture. Then there is no tax whatever upon it. But whenever it is sold to the consumer, and does not further enter into a process of manufacture, there is a tax upon that lumber. I suppose the most difficult case you could mention would be that of rubber used in the manufacture of automobile tires and automobile parts. There is no trouble at all in the administration of the tax, and Mr. Smith, the Assistant Commissioner of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, has said that they have not had any trouble at all with it; not only that, but that they collect 100 per cent of the tax, and the Senator knows that there is no other tax on a retailer under which they collect 100 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. I am not so sure about collecting 100 per cent of any tax. I realize the difficulties. One of the objections to this amendment, it seems to me, is that we are introducing a new scheme, and I am in a very uncertain state of mind about it, although there are many things about it which appeal to me. However, I am afraid that when we get through with this legislation we shall have more legislation by a few experts in the department here, and we shall have taxation by experts rather than taxation by Congress.

Mr. SMOOT. I am very glad the Senator made that statement, because I want to say to the Senator that if we strike out all we have in this bill, and put this amendment in, and have just the six sources of revenue, we will not have any trouble, and every man in the United States and every corporation in the United States, when the returns are made out, will know that they are correct, and if they are not correct it will be because they do not want it to be correct.

Mr. POMERENE. I have a good deal of confidence in any statement or promise or prophecy the Senator may make; nevertheless, there are some things which make me almost a doubting Thomas about this amendment in its present form.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not blame the Senator for being a doubting Thomas. I say to the Senator now that I do not think there are two men in the Bureau of Internal Revenue who can be sent to any part of the United States, at different times, make an examination for the purpose of making a return under the existing law, and get the same result.

I know of one case in my State which I have had examined five times by five different men, and every examination has brought a different result.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator tell me in what respect the plan embodied in his amendment has simplified the administrative features?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the greatest trouble is with what is called the excess-profits tax, because every time that question comes up it involves the question of capital, it involves the question of reserve, it involves the question of good will, the question of patents, and the question of exemptions, based upon those very things, and it is almost impossible to make a return out under the existing law. I want to wipe out that difficulty. I want a simplification of the law. I want a law under which every individual and every corporation in the United States can make a return out without the assistance of an expert.

I do not believe there is a Senator in this Chamber who has made out his own return for the last two or three years. We have even gone so far as to have a man stationed here in the Capitol, not only one but for about three months before the time limit for the filing of returns there were two or three of them, and they prepared the returns for Senators. If Senators, the men who make the laws, can not make the returns out, what can we expect of the ordinary American citizen? What can we expect of the American business man?

Mr. POMERENE. I sympathize with what the Senator is stating; but next year, when I come to make out my return, I am going to ask the members of the Finance Committee to make it out for me.

Mr. SMOOT. I assure the Senator that if he will vote for my amendment, and it shall go into this law, I will make his return out on a piece of paper no bigger than a sheet of note paper. I will vouch for its correctness, and no expert in the world will change it.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not engaged in the manufacturing or mercantile business, so that I will not have any return to make out under the Senator's amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator will. He will have an income tax to pay.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. In the interest of a simplification of the subject which the Senator from Utah has just discussed, if he has not already done so, I suggest that he introduce into the RECORD a table—which I think will require but little space—demonstrating just the taxes which would be eliminated if his plan were adopted, the taxes that would then remain in force compared to the taxes now in force, and the incomes from the various sources still remaining in force in order to balance the budget. It would need to be only a short table, showing the eliminations of the numerous taxes the Senator is discussing, then showing as a result the few taxes left in force, with the income from those various forms of taxes, as compared to the expenditures of the Government. I think if the Senator would do that the Senate would get a very much clearer idea of what would be accomplished under the sales-tax system.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask Senators to look at page 25 of the speech I delivered in the Senate on October 11, where they will find set out in detail those things which are to be cut out of the bill, and with which we will have no trouble in the future if this plan is adopted.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, my mind is open to conviction on this subject, I will say to the Senator from Utah, and my own experience goes far toward inclining me to his position.

The experience to which I refer was this: That in 1919 I employed an expert to make out my income-tax return, because I did not know how to do it, although I had been practicing law 35 or 40 years, and I gave that expert $5 for making out my return. They passed it through the office O. K.; I paid the tax; the return came here to Washington, and I did not hear a word about it until three months ago, when they wrote me that it was wrong. I naturally inquired in what respect it was wrong, and yesterday I received a card from another expert, who came from the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and who tried to point out to me where there was an error of something over $2,000, and, roughly stated, the difference in the tax would be $350. If he is right, I still owe the Government $350, bearing 6 per cent interest.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me say to the Senator from Georgia that his case is only one of a hundred thousand or several hundred thousand; and if the institutions and individuals of this country met the demands for back taxes which have been made by the Treasury Department, many of them would be financially ruined.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am inclined to believe that the Senator from Utah did not fully convey to the Senator from Ohio the information which he sought. The Senator from Ohio referred to a sawmill company, and wanted to know how you would determine and administer the law which would provide that if it were sold for further manufacturing purposes the lumber should be tax free but if sold for consumption it should pay a tax. The Senator from Utah referred to regulations of the department under one or two of the provisions of the existing law, which purports to be a manufacturer's tax, and particularly referred to regulation 47, published by the Treasury Department, and covering the administration of the present manufacturer's sale tax.

I call to the attention of the Senator from Ohio this provision in those regulations, which I am inclined to believe the Senator from Utah did not fully explain. Under those regulations that form 47 it is provided that—

Jobbers or dealers who are not manufacturers and users who are not manufacturing for resale are not entitled to purchase tax free under certificate.

Mr. POMERENE. Not entitled to?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not entitled to purchase tax free under certificate, the effect being that wholesalers under this regulation are treated as purchasers for consumption.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. They are not entitled to purchase tax free; therefore, the wholesaler is put upon the same plane as the purchaser for immediate consumption.

Mr. SMOOT. That is hardly a fair statement. I would not want to mislead the Senator or anyone else.

Mr. POMERENE. I know the Senator would not intentionally mislead.

Mr. SMOOT. I took regulation 47, and selected it as an illustration of the automobile business. In the case to which the Senator refers he would give a certificate, and the form of the certificate, if the Senator will read it, is on the following page of my plan. That will apply to all concerns, and that certificate simply means that within six months, if the purchases are not made for further processes of manufacture, he is responsible for the tax, and the certificate says in just what form he has to give evidence. There is not any trouble about it. Mr. C. P. Smith, the man who stands at the head of the unit in the Treasury Department, has written a letter about it, and he assures Senators that there is none.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not believe the Senator wants to brush aside this very important provision of the regulation of the department. It must have been put in for a very definite purpose, and intended to have some effect, and it must be interpreted just as it reads. If that provision is not in other regulations, that is another fact to be ascertained, but the sample regulation presented here by the Senator from Utah in his speech contains this provision, that wholesalers and jobbers shall be considered the same as purchasers for consumption.

Mr. SMOOT. But this has reference entirely to the example shown where one manufacturer sells to another; and if the Senator will read that carefully, that is exactly what he will find. In that case, of course, this provision is to be made:

Jobbers or dealers who are not manufacturers and users, who are not manufacturing for resale, are not entitled to purchase tax free under certificates.

That is true in this case.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I will ask the Senator if that is true only in that case how would he handle the case of a sale by the refiner to a jobber of sugar? Would that jobber be able to purchase sugar tax free?

Mr. SMOOT. That jobber would say that he is purchasing so much of the sugar to sell into consumption, and it would not enter into any further process of manufacture. Then if he is tax free he gives a certificate. He has to prove that that sugar went to consumption and in no further process of manufacture, or else he is responsible for the tax.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The jobber is selling to wholesalers.

Mr. SMOOT. They are not doing that way with sugar to-day, but take anything else; it would make no difference. It is the same.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very glad to get the assurance of the Senator, but——

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator misunderstood me. Let us treat it just as though it were passing through different hands.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It strikes me there is not a jobber or a wholesaler in the country who, when he buys sugar from a refiner, has any advance information as to how much of that is going to be sold for consumption or how much of it for further manufacture. It would put the burden upon all that class of people to trace every bag of sugar to know whether it went to the consumer or whether it went to some one for further manufacture into candy or for use in canning or other kinds of manufacture.

Mr. SMOOT. The practice has demonstrated beyond question of doubt that there are at least 99 per cent of all the sales of which they know the ultimate destination. The manufacturer that sells knows. If it went to the jobber, he would know; and if it went to the merchant for consumption he would know.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That may be true under the existing law which involves only a comparatively few articles, but when we have such a law as proposed by the Senator's amendment, applying to practically every commodity consumed by the people of the United States and the various articles that enter in the consumption, then the difficulties multiply, and while we might after a sufficient length of time work out a plan for automobile accessories, still it might be very different when we come to some of the other commodities. When we spread that all over the entire field of consumptive articles, the difficulties magnify in geometrical progression.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator really has not taken into consideration the number of people who have to go from one end of the country to the other to make all sorts of examinations which my proposed amendment will eliminate entirely. Let me call his attention to the large number of auditors who are now engaged in checking up the returns of the hundreds of thousands—probably millions—of theaters, moving-picture shows, cabarets, dance halls, railroad companies, telephone, telegraph and express companies, ice cream parlors, insurance companies, drug stores, sellers of soft driks, motor trucking companies, department stores, and all the others—the brokers, pawnbrokers, ship brokers, customhouse brokers, proprietors of theaters, museums, concert halls, circuses, other public exhibitions, bowling alleys, billiard rooms, shooting galleries, riding academies, persons renting automobiles, cigars, cigarettes, and tobacco manufacturers, those who issue bonds, capital stock issues and transfers, sales on produce exchanges, all the persons responsible for stamp taxes on certain drafts, checks, and promissory notes, entry of goods at customs, withdrawal of goods from bonded warehouses, passage tickets, proxies, power of attorney, playing cards, parcel-post packages, insurance policies, and many others which I am not going to mention at this time.

The Senator knows that when these are eliminated, as my amendment proposes to do, we will be able to do away with nearly 10,000 men who to-day are engaged in looking after tax returns. I do not know just the number, because I have not looked it up of late, but they are in every store, in every moving-picture house, in every business house in the Nation, not once in a year but making their rounds several times in that period. Talk about simplification! All this would be done by a few clerks in the department by rules and regulations, and if there is any change or anything that looks suspicious all they have to do is to investigate that particular one.

I wish that I had a copy of a return made in Canada. There was one sent to me the other day, and if there is any Senator who thinks the tax law is unpopular in Canada, just let him make an investigation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me put a case to the Senator and see what his suggestion is under those circumstances. Here is a manufacturer of steel billets. Of course, the billets would not be taxed, if I understand the Senator correctly, because they can not be used unless they are converted into something else. I am right in that, am I not?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose the manufacturer takes those billets and converts them into steel slabs of different dimensions and weights per foot, and a man who has taken a contract to build a bridge orders so many pieces so many inches wide and so many inches thick, and so many pieces of different lengths. They are cut accordingly, and in those dimensions are sent to him. He can not use them yet just as they are because if he uses them in the building of that bridge he must at least get some rivets and he must make the rivet holes, and that is a further process of manufacture.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no, Mr. President; it is not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator, if the manufacturer who converts them simply into slabs and sells them upon an order will pay the tax as upon a completed article, or would the bridge builder have to make a report of the amount that he received for those in connection with the gross sum which he received for constructing the bridge in case he had to drill the rivet holes and purchase the rivets and put them together.

Mr. SMOOT. Whenever a girder is made and ordered for a bridge the holes are already drilled.

Mr. McCUMBER. But suppose to avoid the tax they do not put the holes in?

Mr. SMOOT. That will make no difference. The order will show just what the length is to be and how wide it is to be and for what purpose it is to be used. That is a completed article. The manufacturer will have to pay the tax upon that article. It is a complete article just the same as steel rails. The Senator may say that a steel rail is not a completed article because they may have to cut the steel rail in two to fill in a certain gap in the road and have to bore two holes. That is not so.

The steel rail is completed when it is made into a steel rail, and the manufacturer will have to pay the tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator will remember that in our tariff bills we have had this same question come up as to a complete manufactured article, and we have had our tax laws avoided because certain parts were not assembled. Even the rivet holes were made in them, and yet they were not a completed article, and therefore they escaped the tariff upon a completely manufactured article. The same question, it seems to me, will arise in the matter of levying a tax upon a completed article such as I have spoken of.

Mr. SMOOT. I am quite sure that everybody knows that a girder is a completed article.

Mr. McCUMBER. A girder may be composed of several pieces of flat iron riveted together or it may be that pieces of steel slabs are sent, of which to make a girder.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the way it is done in the trade.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator has made some reference to the Canadian tax. I have before me a copy of Collier's Weekly of June 18, 1921. It contains a very interesting discussion of the sales-tax question and goes into some detail with regard to the result obtained in Canada. It is entitled: "A painless tax," by Stephen Leacock. Perhaps the Senator has seen it?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I have not seen it.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a very excellent argument in support of the sales tax. Of course the author is reasonably correct perhaps in the statement which he makes that—

> The whole of the United States at the present moment buzzes like a beehive with tax discussion. Some think that the taxes ought to fall upon the rich. Others think that they should remain upon the poor. People who have no income claim that the income tax is the ideal method of taxation. People who do not smoke favor very strongly the levying of more taxes on tobacco. People who ride in street cars want to tax motors. Married people believe in taxing bachelors. The manufacturer wants to tax the farmer and the farmer says that he has nothing left. The only general agreement found is in the idea of taxing somebody else.

I think he sizes up the situation fairly well in that statement. He then proceeds to say that Canada has adopted the sales tax and—> has had it in force now for a year, and has achieved such a remarkable success with it that in the new budget just introduced in the Canadian Parliament a large proportion of the public revenue of the Dominion will be raised by it.

> And the wonderful thing about the Canadian sales tax is that the consumer is practically unaware that it is there.

I shall not take up the Senator's time going with any detail into the article, but I call attention to just two of the statements by way of indicating that in Canada, at least according to this author, the plan is meeting with almost universal favor and the results have been most gratifying. They raised over $50,000,000 the first year of operation. Of course, $50,000,000 is a small item with us in this country; but they have extended the tax, I think, in the amended law; they have given it a broader scope than it formerly had. I do not know to just what extent that has gone, but the author says:

> It was not looked upon when it was introduced as a particular solution of anything. If the finance minister saw in it a revolution in the theory and practice of taxation, he did not say so. It came in for practically no discussion in Parliament; and the consumer, after a year of its operation, is still largely ignorant of its existence.

If a sales tax could operate in that way in this country it would be a very admirable scheme, it seems to me. This article continues:

> That, in fact, is the first thing to be noticed about the Canadian tax—it is not levied on or made payable by the consumer. It does not appear, as did the unpopular luxury tax, in the bill for goods bought in a departmental store or an obvious and explicit addition to the price of a pair of trousers.

Of course, that is true; there is no denial of the fact, I think. The Senator has considered that it really is a consumers' tax which will be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. In many cases it will be passed on to the consumer; there is no doubt about it. There are other cases, however, where it certainly will not be passed on, as I have stated to the Senate this afternoon. I presume the Senator from Florida was at lunch at the time I made the statement. I have always admitted that a sales tax was a consumption tax in a sense; that is, a part of it was passed on to the consumer.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why has the Senator changed his amendment? The first proposition of the Senator made the tax 3 per cent I think.

Mr. SMOOT. I have already stated my reason for having made the change.

Mr. FLETCHER. I must say that I was not then present.

Mr. SMOOT. The reason is this: In what I am doing I am not trying to interfere at the present time with the action of the Senate in changing the higher brackets of the income tax, or to relieve the corporations of their capital-stock tax, or of the tax upon their net profits. Taking those taxes into consideration allowed me to reduce the proposed rate from a 3 per cent to a 1 per cent tax.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understand. I desire to read just a little more from this article. It continues:

> The Canadian tax introduced in 1920 was payable, in its actual collection, on the sales and deliveries of manufacturers and wholesalers or jobbers.

That is very much like the proposal here, is it not?

Mr. SMOOT. The Canadian tax may be summed up in this way: If a manufacturer sells direct to a retailer, he pays a tax of 2 per cent; if he sells, however, to a jobber, he pays 1 per cent and the jobber also pays 1 per cent, making the tax 2 per cent when it reaches the retailer. That is how the tax is imposed, and it is twice as difficult to follow those sales in every case as it would be under my amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The article further says:

> If a manufacturer sold an article direct to the consumer, he, the manufacturer, had to pay, according to the scheme adopted for 1920, a tax of 2 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That is just as I have stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. The article continues:

> If he devoted the article to his own use, he paid a tax of 2 per cent; these cases represented, of course, only a small minority of the sales.

Further on the article refers to the recent extension of the sales tax and says:

> Under the recent extension of the sales tax this method of payment remains the same, although the rate of taxation, as will be seen, is considerably raised.

The rate must have been raised above 2 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. It was so raised.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then the article continues:

> Let it be noted further that the Canadian sales tax as it now exists is very far from being a general tax on all sales, or a "turnover tax," so called. Its operation was made subject to a long list of exemptions, which fills an entire page in the statute book and contains 91 items. The list includes such varied commodities as ice, gas, magazines, and artificial limbs. Of these a man may consume as he will tax free. On further analysis by the eye of intelligence it becomes clear that the list of exempted articles is intended to cover all the plain necessaries of life—foodstuffs and clothing and shoes of the plainer grades. The tax does not apply to sales made by the farmer or by those engaged in the sale of material for the manufacture of heat and light and power, and it is not levied, as has already been said, in connection with retail sales to the consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection I wish to say to the Senator from Florida that gas or anything that is manufactured by a public utility would not be taxable under my proposed amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. Nor are farm products.

Mr. SMOOT. All products of the farm, of every name and nature, are specifically exempted.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is a very good point in favor of the Senator's amendment. This article continues:

> When one considers the low rate of the tax, the long list of exemptions, and the apparent lightness of the burden on the consumer, it is little short of amazing that this tax already produces more than either the income tax or the business-profits tax.

The article is very strongly in support of the sale-tax theory.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the 1 per cent sales tax is very low. I can not, of course, say offhand, how much of that will be absorbed by the manufacturer; but as to every article which may be named, whether it be sugar or tea or coffee, or shoes or a pair of stockings, just think how small 1 per cent would be upon 100 such articles which may be taxed, and then consider whether the retailer is intending to make any increase in the price for which he is selling the article now, because he is selling it to-day for every dollar he can make the American people pay for it.

Mr. NORRIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the Senator's amendment would there be any possibility of the tax ever being pyramided so that it would be paid twice?

Mr. SMOOT. That would be impossible.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, let me ask the Senator another question. Let us say that a man is selling candy; would he have to pay a tax?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean if he sold it to a retailer?

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose he did sell it to a retailer; would he pay a tax?

Mr. SMOOT. Did he manufacture it?

Mr. NORRIS. Whether he manufactured it or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I would have to know whether he manufactured it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, suppose he did manufacture it.

Mr. SMOOT. If he manufactured it and sold it to the retailer he would have to pay a tax.

Mr. NORRIS. But originally he bought sugar.

Mr. SMOOT. Then the man who sold the sugar would be exempt from the tax if the sugar was to go into the manufacture of candy.

Mr. NORRIS. Is there that kind of a provision in the amendment?

Mr. SMOOT. There is, absolutely.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take, for example, a manufacturer of automobiles and find out what he would pay. Suppose the manufacturer of automobiles buys nuts and screws in their finished condition; would the man who sold him the nuts and screws have to pay a tax?

Mr. SMOOT. He would not. If a nut or a screw or a cog or a bolt or a part of an engine goes into the manufacture of the automobile and is used for the purpose of making the finished product no tax would be paid on them because of the fact that they are used in the further process of manufacture; but the automobile manufacturer when he finished his automobile and sold it would pay a tax upon his product. That is all there is to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if the man who made screws and nuts sold some of them to go into the manufacture of automobiles, and sold others for purposes other than those incident to manufacturing, he would have to keep his books so as to show that he paid taxes on part of his product and on the other part that he did not pay taxes?

Mr. SMOOT. A certificate would be given, just as the regulations now provide, showing that the man who manufactured the nuts and screws had sold part of his product to be used in a further process of manufacture, and he would be credited for the amount so used.

Mr. NORRIS. In reading the amendment I notice it says, "For consumption or use without further process of manufacture."

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I have wondered whether there would not be a possibility of double taxes being imposed in that respect.

Mr. SMOOT. I can not imagine how.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that the Senator is correct. I merely want to get it clear in my own mind, as I know the Senator does. Say, for instance, that an article is sold for consumption, under the Senator's amendment if would be liable to the tax?

Mr. SMOOT. It would.

Mr. NORRIS. The same article that is finally sold for consumption might be sold "for use without further process of manufacture" long before the consumer gets hold of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean the transferring of goods from one to another when there is to be a further process of manufacture?

Mr. NORRIS. The idea can be illustrated, probably, by, say, a sugar company which manufactures sugar and sells it. I take it under the Senator's amendment it would have to pay the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Provided the sugar is not going into the manufacture of, say, candy.

Mr. NORRIS. Suppose it should not go into the manufacture of candy, but that the company sold it to a jobber, and that it went from him to the wholesaler, and then to the retailer, and the retailer sold it for consumption; then he would have to pay a tax, would he not?

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; the retailer does not pay any kind of a tax; the amendment provides merely for the manufacturer's tax.

Mr. NORRIS. I know the Senator thinks that; but it seems to me there ought to be some proviso to make sure that that would not happen, because there is nothing in the amendment, as I read it, that would make it illegal or impossible for the tax to be paid twice on the same article.

Mr. SMOOT. That is impossible under the wording of the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be right about that, but it seems to me that such a condition might arise——

Mr. SMOOT. It would be impossible.

Mr. NORRIS. Because the amendment does not state, as I read it, that the tax shall not be paid twice, and it might, I should think, be paid once when the article is sold for consumption and paid another time when it is sold for use.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment provides, as I have said, only for a manufacturer's tax.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. SMOOT. The manufacturer is responsible to the Government of the United States for the tax.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; and I think he ought to be.

Mr. SMOOT. And he has either got to pay the tax or he has got to have a certificate to prove that the goods produced by him are going to enter into a further process of manufacture.

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment provides that the tax shall be paid when sold for consumption likewise, and it struck me when I read it that the Senator would accomplish the same thing and avoid any possibility of double taxation ever being paid if he omitted the words "consumption or"—I think those are the words; I do not have the amendment before me—so that it would provide for the imposition of the tax when it is sold for use without further process of manufacture. That would impose the tax the first time the finished article was sold.

Mr. SMOOT. It would apply only to articles that were not consumed, then, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. It would not make any difference what happened to them afterwards.

Mr. SMOOT. This is the very wording that has been used in the Canadian law, and which must be used, I think.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator may be right, but I think there may be some difference of opinion about that.

Mr. LENROOT obtained the floor.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. LADD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BROUSSARD. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question before he sits down?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think I understood the Senator to say that nothing produced on a farm would be subject to the tax under his amendment. I should like to ask a question in regard to that. Suppose that a farmer grows a product and then finishes it so that it is ready for consumption; would a tax be imposed on that farmer on account of that product?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean if he had manufactured it?

Mr. BROUSSARD. For instance, if the farmer takes his corn and grinds it and converts it into grits, would he be subject to the tax?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean if he uses the grits for himself?

Mr. BROUSSARD. He grows the corn and then converts it into a finished product.

Mr. SMOOT. Then he is not only a grower but he is a manufacturer. He would not have to pay a tax upon his corn; there could be no question about that at all.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I merely wanted to know to what extent the farmer would be exempt.

Mr. SMOOT. Not only that, but even if he were a manufacturer he would have an exemption of $6,000.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand. On the other hand, the farmer is only exempt on the products of his farm when he does not finish them and put them in a state where they are sold for consumption. If he does put them in such condition, he is subject to the tax.

Mr. SMOOT. If there are such cases as that, he would be subject to the tax, but he would be exempt on $6,000.

Mr. BROUSSARD. For instance, take the man who grows sugar beets or sugar cane and then converts the beets or the cane into sugar and sells the product for consumption.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator mean that he himself converts the beets or the cane into sugar?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Then he is a manufacturer.

Mr. BROUSSARD. He is not exempt in that case?

Mr. SMOOT. No; because he is a manufacturer. If that were not the case, the Senator can plainly see that some of the big manufacturers of foodstuffs, for instance, could raise cattle and sheep and hogs and everything else and be practically free from taxation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I merely wanted to know to what extent the exemption applies to the farmer who grows such products as those to which I have referred.

Mr. SMOOT. If he becomes a manufacturer, the tax applies.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question before he sits down.

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, one thing that bothers me a little bit is the same thing that bothered the Senator from North Dakota, as to what is a finished product. For instance, take the case of an ordinary hat, made up of wool cloth, we will say, a silk lining, and a ribbon band. When does the tax attach to the ribbon band or the silk lining?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, all of the hat manufacturers in the country buy their bands from the manufacturers; they buy their silk from the manufacturers; and they make their felt. Therefore those materials would be exempt, because the manufacturers buy them, and the manufacturers would not pay a tax on them; but when the hat was finished the manufacturer of the hat would pay a tax.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That would be considered the finished product of the ribbon—when it was made into the hat?

Mr. SMOOT. When it was made into the hat. They all know just exactly what they are buying it for. There is not any question at all about it. The hat manufacturer knows just what he is buying it for, and the seller knows that it is going into the hat; and therefore the tax is not imposed upon that, but is imposed upon the manufactured hat that does not enter into any further process of manufacture.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SIMMONS. Before the Senator from Wisconsin begins his speech, I wish to put into the RECORD some estimates furnished me this morning by the actuary of the Treasury, Mr. McCoy, as to the loss of revenue, comparing the Senate bill with the amendment of the Senator from Utah; that is to say, the amount which the bill as now amended would produce, and the amount which the bill would produce if the amendment of the Senator from Utah is adopted.

The amendment with reference to corporations, fixing the rate beginning with the calendar year 1922 at 15 per cent upon certain corporations and 10 per cent upon other corporations, would result as follows, Mr. President:

Upon the 100,000 corporations to which the 10 per cent rate would apply, according to the estimate of Mr. McCoy, the income would be $268,000,000. Upon the 100,000 corporations to which the 15 per cent rate would apply, the income would be $258,000,000, making a total for the calendar year 1922 of $526,000,000, as against the total of $660,000,000 under the bill without the amendment of the Senator from Utah; making the net loss in revenue on account of the provisions of his bill changing the income-tax rates of corporations $134,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, Mr. President, that is not for this calendar year.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am talking about the first year it is in operation. I am not talking about this calendar year. I said "1922." This is the calendar year 1921.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was talking about the calendar year 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. But the fiscal year, of course——

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not talking about the fiscal year. I am talking about the next calendar year. We are now, for the purposes of income tax, in the calendar year 1921. The Senator makes no change in the law with reference to that. He does, however, make a change for the calendar year 1921, fixing a 10 per cent rate for certain corporations and a 15 per cent rate for other corporations.

The actuary estimates that one half of the corporations, or 100,000 of them, will pay at the 10 per cent rate, and the other half will pay at the 15 per cent rate, and that that will result in a loss of $134,000,000 of revenue.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, did not the Senator offer an amendment the other day virtually the same as this amendment that I have offered?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I did not. The Senator is mistaken about that. I have offered no amendment at all about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say that the Senator had. I understood that he had, as I remembered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SMOOT. It may have been the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], then, who offered it.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Massachusetts offered an amendment with a graduated tax, but he graduated the tax up to 20 per cent. The Senator from Utah graduates it only up to 15 per cent.

The actuary advises me that the loss in revenue by the repeal of Titles V, IX, X, and XI will be $370,000,000, making a total loss of revenue as a result of the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Utah of $504,000,000. The Senator himself estimates that his amendment will raise only $253,000,000, and the actuary, Mr. McCoy, advises me that that is probably considerably more than it will rise, so that, deducting the amount of revenue that the Senator from Utah says his amendment will yield from the losses which the actuary says will result, we have a net loss in revenue of $251,000,000.

I simply wished to put those figures into the RECORD. They are not mine; they are the figures of Mr. McCoy.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that Mr. McCoy no doubt gave those estimates for the calendar year 1923. Here are his estimates, if the Senator wants to see them. That is quite a different matter, because there is $600,000 less revenue to be raised in the calendar year 1923 than there is in 1922.

Mr. SIMMONS. They are based upon 1922, as I understood.

Mr. SMOOT. Here is the estimate that Mr. McCoy gives, on page 7, of the internal revenue bill of 1921, and here are the very figures that he stated: Corporations, 15 per cent, $660,000,000, and for the fiscal year 1922 it was $540,000,000. Are those the figures the Senator gave?

Mr. SIMMONS. What were the figures for the fiscal year?

Mr. SMOOT. They are $540,000,000 and $660,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. The total?

Mr. SMOOT. The loss that there is going to be as the result of adopting my amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would be $504,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it not $540,000,000?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; $504,000,000, and the Senator's amendment will produce $253,000,000, according to his own estimate. The actuary says that that estimate is too high.

Mr. SMOOT. The estimate of $126,000,000 is too high?

Mr. SIMMONS. I said that according to the Senator's own estimate his amendment will raise $253,000,000, as I understood him.

Mr. SMOOT. It will, in a year.

Mr. SIMMONS. In a year?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I stated that the actuary said he thought that was more than it would raise; but, figuring it at what the Senator states, it will raise, deducting that from the $504,000,000 that will be lost as a result of its adoption——

Mr. SMOOT. By what? How is it going to be lost, outside of the excess-profits tax?

Mr. SIMMONS. Why, the Senator loses $134,000,000 on account of his change in the rates on incomes of corporations.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. And he loses $370,000,000 on account of the repeal of Titles V, IX, X, and XI, which amounts to $504,000,000 which we will lose from those two sources if the Senator's amendment is adopted, while his amendment will yield only $253,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have the estimates here, and, as I stated, I shall put them in the RECORD, and I know that they are going to raise this amount of money. I have asked Mr. McCoy himself if they were not going to do so, and these were the figures that we agreed upon. The Senator from North Carolina comes in here now and takes calendar years and tries to figure out what the receipts will be in fiscal years. With the bill as it stands upon the table now, the calendar year is quite different from the fiscal year, because the excess-profits tax goes out in one case and it does not in the other. The Senator knows that there is quite a difference between estimating for a calendar year and estimating for a fiscal year. As I stated in the first place, the sales tax for this fiscal year will produce only $126,500,000, but for the next calendar year it will produce twice that amount.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, there is nothing in what the Senator is saying that militates in the slightest degree against the figures I have given. The income tax upon corporations, like the income tax upon individuals, is based upon the earnings of a calendar year. Upon the earnings of the calendar year of 1922 Mr. McCoy says that the change in the income-tax rates of corporations made by the Senator's amendment will result in a loss of revenue amounting to $134,000,000. The only way in which you can estimate what you are getting from corporations is to take the calendar year. He also estimates that for the whole calendar year 1923 the taxes that would be actually collected under the miscellaneous taxes which the Senator repeals amount to $370,000,000, and adding those two together makes the sum that I have just given. The only difference is that this calculation is made on the basis of a calendar year, and it shows that in a calendar year you would lose that much. If you should convert the calendar year into a fiscal year and assign one half of the amount to the previous fiscal year and the other half to the succeeding fiscal year you would not make any change as to the amount of it which was collected in the calendar year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I say that if Mr. McCoy's figures are right, the 100,000 corporations paying 10 per cent would yield $268,000,000 and the 100,000 corporations paying 15 per cent would yield $258,000,000. That amounts to $526,- 000,000; there is no question about that; and here is Mr. McCoy's own estimate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Those are the same figures that I gave—$526,000,000—under the Senator's bill, and at the 15 per cent rate the estimate is that the tax would yield $660,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have before me the estimate that was given by Mr. McCoy to the Finance Committee for the fiscal year 1923.

Mr. SIMMONS. The first estimate was made on the calendar year and the second was made on the calendar year.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; but the fiscal year 1923 takes six months of the calendar year 1922, and the same law will be in force from the beginning of January, 1922, under my bill, and Mr. McCoy says here that there is $543,000,000 instead of $660,000,000. I ask the Senator to look at it and see it for himself.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not doubt what the Senator is saying, but this calculation is based upon the calendar year, and the amounts to be collected hereafter will have to depend upon the amounts collected in the calendar year, when the rates of income proposed are in operation, and the Senator is estimating what they will be in effect if these rates are put into operation on the 1st day of January, 1922.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not think Mr. McCoy wanted to make any statement like that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think he has made an inconsistent statement.

Mr. McCoy has just handed me this table, which shows that my statement was correct:

Loss of revenue as compared with Senate bill.

SENATOR SMOOT'S MANUFACTURES TAX.

	Calendar year 1922.	Fiscal year 1923.
Corporation income tax	$134,000,000	$134,000,000
Parts of Titles V, IX, X, and XI	370,000,000	370,000,000
Total loss	504,000,000	504,000,000
Estimated revenue from manufactures tax of Senator Smoot	253,000,000	253,000,000
Net loss	251,000,000	251,000,000

This table shows that the net loss of revenue for the calendar year 1922 would be $251,000,000, the same as I stated before, and the net loss for the fiscal year 1923 would be $251,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I have here the statement of Mr. McCoy himself, and I ask Senators not to take my word for it. Take the report and look at it. He says the returns from corporations for the fiscal year 1923, which is the period about which I asked the Senator in the first place, would be $540,000,000, and Mr. McCoy said that under my proposal they would raise $526,000,000.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I decline to yield further.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have no objection, if the Senator insists on going ahead.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in opening his remarks the Senator from Utah said he had discussed on another occasion the principle of his proposed tax and would not repeat to-day what he then said. Upon another occasion I discussed at some length my views in opposition to that tax, especially with reference to its administration, and I shall not take the time of the Senate to repeat those views to-day.

The Senator from Utah said that this sales tax is favored by 75 per cent of the people of the United States. In analyzing that statement we must first inquire who the people of the United States are, and I venture to say that that statement can not be substantiated if among the people of the United States are included the farmers, because I do not know of one farmers' organization which has declared itself in favor of the sales tax, and I do know that practically every leading farm organization of the country has declared against it. If that statement is to be substantiated, in addition to excluding the farmers of the United States we must exclude the labor organizations of the United States.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. In just a moment. I do not know of any form of organized labor in this country which has declared in favor of the sales tax, but I do know of a very large part of organized labor that has declared against the sales tax.

Mr. President, I do not know of anyone who may be termed the "ultimate consumer" who has favored it, except some who think that through the sales tax they would get rid of some other taxes they are called upon to pay.

There are many conscientious men, of course, like the Senator from Utah, who favor the sales tax; but the great propaganda that is going on in this country, and has been for a considerable time, comes for the most part from people who think that by the sales tax they will escape taxes they are now called upon to pay. But there are many people who may not be termed ultimate consumers, who are manufacturers and business men, who have been misled by this sales-tax propaganda, and are only now beginning to realize that especially the proposition now pending before the Senate would be a direct injury to the manufacturers of this country instead of a benefit.

Within the last few minutes I have received a telegram which I am going to ask to have read from the desk. I do not know anything about the signers of the telegram, and I merely submit it to the Senate for what is may be worth. I ask unanimous consent that it may be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the telegram.

The reading clerk read the telegram, as follows:

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILL., November 3, 1921.

Hon. IRVINE L. LENROOT,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Press reports say that you will speak to-day in opposition to sales tax. Please convey to the Senate the following: Speaking for 35,000 manufacturers, jobbers, and merchants composing our organization, I wish to protest against the adoption of any form of general sales tax. A sales tax will fall on business and industries, prevent prices from falling, and thus hinder a return to normal conditions.

OTTO CULLMAN,
Chairman Committee Manufacturers and Merchants on Federal Taxation (Inc.).

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the major part of the propaganda for a sales tax has come from the representation that if a sales tax were adopted the surtax upon incomes would be reduced; that the complicated returns would be abolished; that the tax upon corporations would be reduced; and that the complicated corporation-tax returns would be abolished; but under the pending proposal there is no simplification for the individual taxpayer; it does not affect him in the slightest degree. If this tax be adopted, his complicated returns will be continued in the future as they have been in the past.

So in the case of corporation returns, if the pending amendment be adopted, it will not simplify the corporation returns one single iota. They will be exactly the same, whether this amendment be adopted or whether it be defeated.

I am not one who will take the position of being opposed to a sales tax under all circumstances. In my judgment, a sales tax is justified only when we have reasonably exhausted all other sources of ability to pay, and until such sources are exhausted, a sales tax, whether it be a manufacturers' tax or a turnover tax, can not be justified, because it violates the principle of taxation according to ability to pay.

The time may come, Mr. President, when, having reasonably exhausted these other sources, and additional revenue is needed, a sales tax will be justified. I am not ready to say, for instance, that if in this bill we impose all taxes upon wealth which equitably ought to imposed, and impose all taxes upon corporations which equitably ought to be imposed, and impose all taxes upon special privileges which equitably ought to be imposed, and then we need more revenue, I should be inclined to favor a sales tax, and I think we are very likely to face that condition in the very near future.

Before this bill shall go from the Senate we are given to understand that a proposition will be made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to attach an amendment to this bill providing for the soldiers' bonus, and a method of paying for it by a continuation of the excess-profits tax. I shall not impute any political motives to the Senator from Missouri, but I venture to say to those upon the other side of the aisle that while they may think they are securing a political advantage because of the fact that the soldiers' bonus will not be incorporated in this bill—and it will not be—their joy over that fact will not be very long lived, because the soldiers' bonus bill will pass the Senate, the soldiers' bonus bill will pass the next Congress, and the soldiers will have lost nothing by the delay, because under the provisions of the bill which is now sleeping in the committee not one dollar of payment would be made to any soldier before the 1st day of next July; and while I am not a prophet, and I know only how I myself shall vote, I venture to say that before the 1st day of July comes around the soldiers' bonus bill will have been passed by an overwhelming majority of both Houses of Congress, and it will be time enough then for those upon the other side to charge the Republican Party with ingratitude to the soldier, but not until then will they have any foundation for doing so.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, will the Senator then kindly inform us what advantage has accrued to the country from the recommitment of the bonus bill, which was before the Senate for consideration at the time the President came and asked that it be recommitted?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not, Mr. President; and I will say further that there is no disadvantage to the soldier in its recommitment, provided it is passed before the time that he would secure benefits under it.

I brought that matter up to state that if in this bill, when it is finally enacted, we have reasonably exhausted other sources of taxation, then I shall be willing to vote for some kind of a sales tax to raise the revenue necessary to pay that bonus.

Who would pay the sales tax? We will all agree that it must either be absorbed by the manufacturer, paid by the consumer, paid by the producer, or divided between two of the three or all three. That must be so. If it is paid by the consumer, it falls unequally upon the man with a low income, a man who is barely able to support his family with the necessaries of life, as against the man with a fifty thousand or hundred thousand dollar income.

A computation has been made upon this basis, showing the inequality of the burden imposed by a sales tax upon the man receiving $1,500 or $2,000 a year and the man having an income of $50,000 a year, and that computation shows that the man receiving $1,500 a year will pay twice as large a percentage on his net income on account of the sales tax as will the man with an income of $50,000 a year. That is bound to be true, because there is no sales tax on service provided for in this bill.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Department of Justice, after a very complete investigation, decided that the cost of living was increased by 23.2 per cent to the consumer because of the adoption of the excess-profits tax. Does the Senator think that either the manufacturers' tax as proposed by the Senator from Utah or the 1 per cent turnover tax on goods, wares, and merchandise would amount to anything like 23.2 per cent?

Mr. LENROOT. In the first place, I must beg to differ with the Senator from Indiana as to any such finding ever being made by the Department of Justice. On the contrary, I deny it.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not deny that Mr. Figg, of the Department of Justice, made such an investigation?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, we have some subordinate official in every department who may make an investigation; but the Senator from Indiana said that the Department of Justice had made such a finding. The Department of Justice never made any such finding.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Made in the Department of Justice and for the Department of Justice.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no. It might have been made, but it was never adopted by the Department of Justice and never concurred in by the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is not my understanding. It was concurred in by him, and it was officially stated at the time, and I do not think there is any question about it in the world.

Mr. LENROOT. I would be very glad if that proof could be furnished, and I assume it would have been furnished long before this if it had existed.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let me ask the Senator a question. Does the Senator deny that the excess-profits tax is passed on to the consumer?

Mr. LENROOT. In a rising market, no. In a market like we have to-day, yes. Does the Senator differ with me?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. There is no excess-profits tax now, except, perhaps, $400,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. That is a good deal of money to me.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; but nothing as compared with $2,500,000,000 which it originally raised.

Mr. LENROOT. And I wish to say that I voted to repeal the excess-profits tax.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; I know the Senator did.

Mr. LENROOT. But I have never agreed with a statement made by some subordinate official, whether he be clerk or otherwise, in the Department of Justice that has been bruited abroad in this country as being a finding of the Department of Justice, which it was not.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I think we must all agree that when we try to figure out just what effect an excess-profits tax has upon the cost of living we are indulging in pure speculation. I would like to know by what process of mental gymnastics any man, whether he be a subordinate or the head of the Department of Justice, could figure to a nicety the increase in the cost of living due to the excess-profits tax. As the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] suggests, it is only one in a thousand. I grant it has had something to do with it; at least I think it did.

Mr. LENROOT. I think it had, but it must also be remembered that the increased cost of living began back in 1916 and kept going up constantly; and in 1918, of the entire income of the people, the excess-profits tax only constituted 5 per cent; and yet the cost of living kept increasing.

But this is not a proposition to substitute a sales tax for the excess-profits tax. If it was there would be some merit in the point which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] makes. But, whatever be the fact with reference to the excess-profits tax, we are repealing that irrespective of the fact of this amendment and we are taking off, if the pending amendment is agreed to, as I shall show a little later, taxes where they can well be borne and putting them upon the general consumer.

I was speaking of the unequal burden of a sales tax on the man with the large income, as compared with the man with the small income. That is because the man with a very limited income has to expend almost all of his income upon commodities that are taxed by the amendment of the Senator from Utah, while the man with the large income, spending his income only upon a comparatively small portion of the commodities that are taxed by the Senator's amendment, is not taxed to such an extent.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, the Senator knows that the man with a $1,500 income pays taxes only in proportion to that amount, while the man with an income of $50,000 has to pay an income tax on that amount. The Senator will admit that.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator from Utah take the position that we are imposing too great a tax by way of surtaxes and therefore we should exempt the rich man through the means of his sales tax?

Mr. SMOOT. No; certainly not.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the result of the Senator's logic.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator's contention were true that it is all paid, that would be the only tax that he would pay toward the maintenance of the Government. I do not think there is any man or any woman in the United States with an income who ought not to pay a little toward the maintenance of the Government. I think they would be better citizens, and I think they would be more interested in how the taxes were spent than if they were exempt entirely.

Mr. LENROOT. The point I am making, and I see the Senator from Utah does not deny it, is that the man with the small income under the sales tax pays a very much larger percentage of his net income on account of the sales tax than does the man with the larger income. That is one point I desire to make in connection with it.

Mr. SMOOT. That would all depend upon how much of the income he spends. Some of them spend more than others.

Mr. LENROOT. I will take a moment to show what the average expenditure of a $50,000 income is and what is not taxed as compared with the income of a $2,000 or $3,000 man. Servants' salaries, no tax; gardeners' help of all kinds, no tax, and so on; saddle horses, no tax. I could go on with a list of some 20 items, only about one-half of which will pay any tax whatever, whereas when you turn to the man with a small income there are very few items of expenditure upon his part that will not be taxed by the Senator's amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have not seen the list which the Senator has before him, but does the Senator say that the household which employs servants pays no tax as a consumption tax by reason of the employment of servants?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I did not say that. I said the wages paid to servants.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The wages are not the only thing.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; of course not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are various articles of equipment.

Mr. LENROOT. If I did not say wages, it was an omission on my part, but that is what I intended to say.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, when a man buys a harness for his horse, if he is able to keep a horse in these days, he pays a tax on it.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes. I asked who pays the tax? I have admitted that in a rising market it will be passed on to the consumer. I showed the other day conclusively, I think, because the Senator from Utah did not question it in his speech, that the consumer pays not only the 1 per cent tax, but he pays on a fair computation of profits about 1.40 per cent. In the case of a falling market, in the case of such a market as we have to-day and as we have had during the past few months, it can not be passed on to the consumer, and the manufacturers of the country to-day, as has been repeatedly stated by the Senator from Utah, are, generally speaking, not making any excess profits. It has been repeatedly stated by the manufacturers of the country that many of them are doing business at a loss, are doing business in order to keep men employed and save as much as possible of the overhead expense.

Now, the Senator may say that a 1 per cent tax upon gross income, because that is what it means so far as the manufacturer is concerned, is not burdensome. Let us see whether it is burdensome or not. Let us see whether a tax of 1 per cent on the gross income under conditions as they exist to-day is not burdensome.

I hold in my hand figures from the Treasury Department showing the percentage of net income to gross income for the tax year 1917, the latest figures I could obtain, giving the different industries in detail. I think it is fair to say the income this year will not average more than one-half of the income in 1917, which was one of our most prosperous years, and so for the purpose of the statement I am about to make I am going to assume the incomes of those corporations and individuals are one-half to-day what they were in 1917.

Manufacturers of oils, vegetable and animal fat: Their percentage of net income to gross income was 5.64. Upon the assumption that their income is only one-half to-day what it was then, the sales tax proposed by the Senator from Utah, in addition to the other taxes proposed, will amount to 40 per cent of their net income, assuming that it can not be passed on.

Food and food products, 6.20. Assuming it is to-day 3.10, the Senator's tax will be 30 per cent of the net income of those corporations in addition to what they are compelled to pay under the other provisions of the bill.

Confectionery and flour and feed are 30 per cent.

Meat packers, 80 per cent. The figures show that their percentage of net income to gross income was 2.28. I have the whole range of articles and commodities, and there is not an article where it does not show that, if the tax can not be passed on to the consumer, a 1 per cent tax upon the gross income will impose a tax of from 30 to 50 or 60 per cent on the net income of those corporations in addition to the taxes they are now called upon to pay.

I would observe in passing that the Senator's amendment selects a class of our people for taxation, assuming that the tax can not be passed on, which can least afford to pay additional taxes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not any doubt, and have not had at any time, that the statement made by the Senator is correct; that is to say, that the tax on the net income will be ten times as great as the tax on the gross income. The gross income in 1918 ran about $86,000,000,000 and the net income about $8,000,000,000, so that it would amount to 10 to 1. I have not any doubt that it would be a great burden on a corporation if it were not passed on, but does not the Senator believe that it is passed on, and is not that the very purpose and object of this kind of a tax?

Mr. LENROOT. In a rising market, yes; but does the Senator from Indiana believe that all costs are passed on to the consumer to-day by the manufacturers of the country? Does not the Senator know that in his own State, as in mine, factories are running this very day without the thought of a single dollar of profit, hoping that they can keep even and continue to give employment to labor?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator ask me that question?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I have not any doubt that the statement which the Senator makes is partially true. That is to say, I do not now claim that all of the excess-profits taxes, for instance, are passed on. In a sellers' market they are all passed on. In a buyers' market they are only partially passed on. But we are not talking about that kind of a tax. I am assuming, and I think correctly, that if we have this kind of a tax it will be passed on in practically every instance throughout the whole country in all forms of business.

Mr. WILLIS. Passed on to whom?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. To the ultimate consumer.

Mr. WILLIS. Is it the Senator's understanding that the sales tax in the last analysis is paid by the ultimate consumer?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. By the consumer, and that is the very object of the sales tax, that it shall be paid by the ultimate consumer.

Mr. WILLIS. Is that the reason why everybody is seeking to get rid of taxes and is in favor of passing them on to somebody else?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I imagine so.

Mr. WILLIS. They want to pass it on to the other fellow. Is that the idea?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Partially that, of course. But I do not care to take the time of the Senator from Wisconsin. I shall answer that proposition a little bit in my own time.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this proposed tax applies to all manufacturers alike. So where there is competition to-day if the 1 per cent is paid it will be paid by all alike and all will have the same obligation.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see about that. The ability to sell depends upon the ability to buy. The higher the cost to the manufacturer is increased by the imposition of an additional tax or otherwise, that much more difficult is it made to buy. For instance, instead of a 1 per cent tax, suppose the tax were made 50 per cent. Does the Senator think the manufacturers could pass that tax on and sell the same amount of goods they could sell without the tax?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No; I do not.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody ever claimed that.

Mr. LENROOT. I knew the Senator from Indiana did not claim that.

Mr. SMOOT. Nobody ever claimed it, and there is no need of bringing such an argument as that into this discussion.

I do not agree with the Senator from Indiana that all of this tax would be passed on to the ultimate consumer. I cited case after case to-day where that would not be so; but there is not any doubt that some of it would be passed on, particularly in the case of some businesses.

Of course I know, Mr. President, that the meat packers are against the imposition of this tax; there is not any doubt about that; but they are about the only manufacturers in the United States who are against it. Outside of the packing industry other manufacturers are willing to assume it.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. NELSON. I only desire to interrupt the Senator to say that I concur entirely in the statement of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. This tax will ultimately fall upon the consumers, rich and poor, throughout the country. The great vice of the proposed tax is that it is based not upon the ability to buy but upon the necessities of the people. It is based upon what they are obliged to buy in order to enable them to live, and not on their ability to pay, as other taxes are supposed to be imposed.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator certainly is correct. I think it was the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] who the other day said this was a voluntary tax.

Mr. SMOOT. I never made any such statement.

Mr. LENROOT. I beg the Senator's pardon, but some Senator made that statement. However, I will not charge it to the Senator from Utah. Some Senator did upon the floor make the statement that it was a voluntary tax; that a man did not have to pay it unless he wanted to.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I did not suppose that anybody in the history of the world every paid a voluntary tax.

Mr. LENROOT. Some Senator—I can not remember who it was—said that a man could refrain from buying if he did not want to pay the tax.

Mr. President, men must eat, men must live, and under the amendment of the Senator from Utah every man who eats and every man who buys clothing or coal, in addition to all of the taxes imposed by this bill, will be compelled to pay the so-called sales tax. The Senator from Utah will not deny that.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I do.

Mr. LENROOT. If it is carried on to the consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator puts it in that way the statement is true. Soft coal at the mouth of the mine to-day is selling for about $2.50. One per cent on $2.50 amounts to 2½ cents. Hard coal to-day at the mine is worth about $5.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; it is worth $8.

Mr. SMOOT. No; not at the mine.

Mr. LENROOT. It is worth $8 at the mine.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not here the list of prices.

Mr. LENROOT. I saw the price on yesterday, and so I happen to know.

Mr. SMOOT. I have seen the lists of prices and have them in my office. The average of the prices which were given me when I first figured this out was $5 a ton.

Mr. LENROOT. No hard coal, I will say to the Senator, has been sold during this year at the mouth of the mine for $5 a ton.

Mr. SMOOT. I only take the report of the Bureau of Mines; that is where I got my information. One per cent on the price of $5 is 5 cents per ton; and even if the price were $8 a ton, as the Senator from Wisconsin says it is, 1 per cent would only be 8 cents a ton, and if the dealer who retails the coal to the consumer is not making enough to pay that amount of tax I am very much surprised.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us examine that statement for a moment, Mr. President. The opponents of the excess-profits tax, as indicated by the Senator from Indiana, says that not only was the tax being passed on to the consumer but because of the existence of that kind of tax those who paid it in the first instance were doubling it and trebling it and quadrupling it when the goods reached the consumer. But the Senator from Utah says that with a sales tax, which offers exactly the same opportunity, which offers the same inducement, that will not be done; that this kind of a tax will not be passed on to the consumer.

Mr. SMOOT. When the tax goes beyond 1 per cent and reaches 5 per cent or 50 per cent, of course the tax would be passed on; there is no doubt about that; but the tax proposed by me is so small that I do not see that the retailer who delivers his coal into the consumer's bin is going to add 2½ cents more a ton to the price.

Mr. WILLIS. The way they usually figure it, they would probably add about 50 cents. That is probably a little high, but they would add 25 cents anyway.

Mr. SMOOT. Then under existing law they would add about $3, because the taxes that are to be taken off are such that they would more than make up the difference.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator in his argument argues against himself, because the higher the tax the more difficult it is to double or quadruple it, because there is a point that reaches beyond the line of ability to purchase. It is easy to double a 1 per cent tax; it is easy to quadruple it; yes, it is even easy to multiply it 10 times; and it will be used as an excuse for increasing prices. It will be very much easier to increase prices under this amendment than it is under the existing excess-profits tax law whenever we have a rising market.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. I think it was a common experience of every man who went to make a purchase at a drug store or other place where the little articles were purchased that the imposition of the stamp taxes was constantly being used as an excuse to increase the price. If a stamp tax was 1 cent, in many of the drug stores 5 cents was added to the price.

Mr. SMOOT. The stamp had to be put right on the article.

Mr. POMERENE. I know that, and the sales tax has to be put right on also.

Mr. SMOOT. That was a 4 per cent tax, whereas my amendment only proposes a tax of 1 per cent.

Mr. NELSON. One very serious question occurs to me in reference to the question of coal. When is the coal a finished product under this law—when it leaves the mine or when it is delivered to me?

Mr. LENROOT. Under the amendment of the Senator from Utah when it leaves the mine.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely; there is not any doubt about that.

Mr. LENROOT. What I have said about the tax being passed on multiplied many times is emphasized in a market where it is possible for them to do it. Of course, it can be done in case of coal, because people have to buy coal whether they want to buy it or not; but as to the general run of manufactured articles in a market such as we have now, with a depression such as at present exists, the tax must be borne by the manufacturer, and it is too great a tax for him to stand in addition to the other taxes.

Mr. President, I have discussed the tax paid by the manufacturer; I have discussed the tax paid by the consumer. We will assume now that it can not be passed on to the consumer because of market conditions. The manufacturer then, very naturally, in order to save himself from as much loss as possible, is going to take it out of the producer of the raw material which he uses. Can there be any doubt about that? Is not that going to lower the price of the products of the farm? If the tax can not be passed on to the consumer, is it not very likely that it will be taken out of the producers of the raw material and be used as an excuse for paying them lower prices?

We talk about the transportation rates. We have repealed the tax on transportation because it was constantly insisted that that was paid in large part by the farmers and producers of food. Freight rates are complained of by both the producer and the consumer upon the theory that they are not all passed on but are taken out of the producing end. If that is true of freight rates, if that is true of the transportation tax, it is just as true of a sales tax. There can not be any question about that, for if a tax can not be passed on to the consumer, if the manufacturer can take it out of the producer he is going to do it.

Now, Mr. President, I want to refer to another feature of the Senator's amendment. He says it is going to simplify the tax laws. I said a little while ago that instead of simplifying the tax laws it will complicate them. His amendment will make this tax measure far more complicated than the existing law, as I think I shall be able to demonstrate. I said a little while ago that the pending amendment has nothing to do with income-tax returns of individuals or corporations, which comprise the most complicated feature of the present law and which have given rise to the greatest criticism. The amendment does not affect that feature of the tax law in the slightest degree, but it does add another complication to the corporation tax. That is the first proposition to which I desire to call attention.

The Senator's amendment provides for a corporation tax, beginning next year, of 15 per cent—

Provided—

Now, let us see how simple it is—

Provided, however, That if the average income and war or excess-profits taxes paid by any corporation for the three years next preceding have amounted to 10 per cent or less of the average net income of the corporation for those years the tax shall be 10 per cent of such excess amount.

Now, I want to ask the Senator from Utah, because I desire to understand this amendment if I can, whether he means 10 per cent of the average net income after or before the credits have been deducted?

Mr. SMOOT. After the credits have been deducted.

Mr. LENROOT. Then, Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah what he means by the use of the word "income"? Why did he not say "any corporation that has paid war or excess-profits taxes"? There can not be a corporation that paid, after credits are deducted, less than 10 per cent either on any year or an average of years. Does not the Senator agree with me?

Mr. SMOOT. No; I can not follow the Senator to save my soul.

Mr. LENROOT. A corporation pays 10 per cent upon its income next year, 10 per cent upon its income the second year, and 10 per cent upon its income the third year. Has it not got to pay 10 per cent on the average for those three years?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true; but if the corporation paid 100 per cent in a year——

Mr. LENROOT. I am not talking about the excess-profits tax now; I am talking about the income tax.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment means all the taxes that are paid. Of course, the excess-profits tax will expire on the date fixed by the pending bill, and then, of course, the amendment will not apply to the excess-profits taxes, but will apply to all other taxes imposed under the law.

Mr. LENROOT. So that it can never pay less than 10 per cent. Could it ever pay less than 10 per cent under the Senator's own interpretation?

Mr. SMOOT. It would pay less than 10 per cent on the average.

Mr. LENROOT. How could that be?

Mr. SMOOT. Because it may not make 10 per cent at all.

Mr. LENROOT. It would pay 10 per cent on the average income, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. On the average income for three years, which may make more than 10 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. Is it the Senator's idea that if they make less one year, when naturally no income tax is to be paid, that that is to be deducted?

Mr. SMOOT. That will pay on the average of the three years. England used to have a period of five years; and there was not any question about that provision, and there should be no question about this one. The only reason I put those words in I will say to the Senator——

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator mean that he is providing in this amendment for a deduction of the losses in arriving at net income?

Mr. SMOOT. I did not say "losses."

Mr. LENROOT. I said losses.

Mr. SMOOT. The amendment does not so provide.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well. If a corporation has no net income for one year, it pays no tax, does it?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly, if it has no income it pays no tax under existing law; but if it earned the next two years 50 per cent, then it would pay an income tax of 15 per cent, because the average would be 33⅓ per cent, and it would pay a tax of 15 per cent.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah just started a phrase which he did not complete.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator interrupted me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Wisconsin asked the Senator from Utah a question, and the Senator from Utah started to say that "the only reason why he put in those words was"—and then he did not give the reason. What is the reason?

Mr. SMOOT. I think what I was going to call the Senator's attention to was this: Will the Senator from Wisconsin yield? I do not want to take his time.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Under the bill as it is now pending and as has been agreed to in the Senate the tax for this year will be 10 per cent, but after this year it will be 15 per cent flat. More than one hundred thousand corporations in the United States did not have any excess profits last year, and did not have during the war. Therefore, under the bill as agreed to here in the Senate their taxes would be raised, as far as the income of the corporation is concerned, 50 per cent at once; and I provide in my amendment that that shall not be done.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I am entirely in sympathy with what the Senator wants to do, but I do not think he is doing it in a proper way.

Mr. SMOOT. I think I am.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I want to ask the Senator this question: Under this amendment, if a corporation once gets on the 10 per cent basis, does it not forever stay on the 10 per cent basis?

Mr. SMOOT. No; it does not under the wording of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see.

Mr. SMOOT. It never will be so construed.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see whether that is true:

> That if the average income and war or excess-profits taxes paid by any corporation for the three years next preceding have amounted to 10 per cent or less of the average net income of the corporation for those years, the tax shall be 10 per cent of such excess amount.

Under the Senator's amendment, if a corporation pays 10 per cent next year, that would be determined upon whether or not it had made excess profits during the three years preceding. If it was found that it had not, and belonged in the 10 per cent class, it would always stay in the 10 per cent class no matter what its earnings were, would it not?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator read only a part of the amendment. If the Senator will read the full amendment he will see that that can not be:

> That, in lieu of the tax imposed by section 230 of the revenue act of 1918, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for each taxable year upon the net income of every corporation a tax—

And then it states the amount of the tax. So it is the three years preceding the year in which the net income is determined, and for each taxable year thereafter. There is not any doubt at all about it.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see whether or not there is any doubt about it. There is not any doubt about it, but not in the way the Senator states.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator want to change it so as to make it that way?

Mr. LENROOT. I am just calling attention to what the Senator's proposition is. I am not talking about changing it. I have an amendment that will cure it, I think, but I choose to do that in my own way.

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator says there is no doubt about it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is not.

Mr. LENROOT. Under his proposition, if a corporation next year gets the benefit of the 10 per cent tax, will the Senator tell me how it ever could be raised, because it never would be paying more than 10 per cent?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, if the corporation paid 10 per cent this year, as the Senator says, and next year it paid 20 per cent, and the next year 20 per cent, that would be 50 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, no; I have a right to ask the Senator to take my assumption that a given corporation under the Senator's amendment is entitled next year to a 10 per cent tax. Now, could it ever be raised?

Mr. SMOOT. It could if the rate of income of that company increased after the following three years.

Mr. LENROOT. No; if the tax has amounted to more than that, it can not ever pay more than 10 per cent. It might earn 100 per cent under this amendment, but if it once got into the 10 per cent class it never would pay any more.

Mr. SMOOT. No such construction can be put upon the amendment. I have had it drawn by as good attorneys as there are in the department, and I have not any doubt that the Senator's construction of it is wrong.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Anyway, Mr. President, that is not the intention?

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all, and if there is any question about it I will change it in any way that may be necessary. The Senator knows what I intended, and not only that, but I believe that the construction I have placed upon the amendment is the only construction that could be placed upon it.

Mr. LENROOT. I have had it examined by others than myself, advising the Senator's committee——

Mr. SMOOT. So have I.

Mr. LENROOT. And they inform me that my construction is correct. We will have to let it go at that.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Utah is willing to amend his amendment in any way that will suit the Senator from Wisconsin, I assume that the Senator from Wisconsin will be satisfied.

Mr. LENROOT. I am very frank to say that I have an amendment lying upon the table providing for a 10 per cent tax on all corporations earning less than 8 per cent.

Now, Mr. President, I want to go on a little further. I call attention to the "simplification" of this law in this amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator that the objection I have to his amendment is that the Senator brings back into the question the elements of capital, reserve, and all of the matters that now make the excess-profits tax so impossible of administration.

Mr. LENROOT. Again must I disagree with the Senator. I do not bring into the law anything that is not there now. Under the law now, and as it is agreed it will remain, the Treasury Department must ascertain the average value of the capital stock, and that is what my amendment is based upon. There is no question of invested capital in it at all.

Mr. SMOOT. There will be.

Mr. LENROOT. Now, I want to go on a little further and refer in only a passing way to the impossibility of the administration of this law.

The Senator from Nebraska asked the Senator from Utah about a given case of sugar sold by the refiner to the wholesaler, and sold by the wholesaler to the retailer for consumption. The Senator said there would be but one tax. Let us see. Suppose the retailer sells the sugar to a baker. The baker uses that sugar in bread and cake. Is there not another tax? Can there be any question about it? There are a multitude of cases of that kind. If the Senator says it is going to be traced back to the manufacturer, and the check is to be made upon the manufacturer, could there be anything more vague or indefinite in a piece of legislation than such a provision as this?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Under the Senator's construction of the law, in which I concur, how would you manage to tax leather, for instance? That is a finished product.

Mr. SMOOT. It is to go into the manufacture of harness, and it is to go into the manufacture of shoes, and it goes into a further process of manufacture. You do not eat leather; you do not do anything with it, except to make it into something else.

Mr. STANLEY. Would there be no tax at the time the leather was sold for half soles?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, certainly not, because it is to go into a further process of manufacture.

Mr. LENROOT. No; there would not be, and if it is sold to a shoemaker who makes shoes to order in a little cobbler shop we will have to have a Government agent watching that cobbler to see that he pays his manufacturers' tax, under this amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Would not the baker have to pay it?

Mr. LENROOT. I have just referred to that. He would have to pay it, and there would be a double tax, without any question, if he bought from the retailer.

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. STANLEY. In the case of a paper manufacturer, it would be still worse.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

I referred the other day to the case of oil sold to the owner of a pipe line. The Senator, in his speech, thrust that aside. He said that is easy to determine. His amendment says that the producer or manufacturer shall pay the tax. He does not know whether that oil, sold by him going into the pipe line, is going to be sold to a refinery or is to be used for fuel. There is no way on earth for him to know. How is the tax going to be determined?

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows that the man who puts in the oil at one end of the pipe line does not take out at the other end of the pipe line that identical oil. If he puts in 10 barrels at one end, he takes out, perhaps before ever that oil gets there, 10 barrels of oil, and he is responsible for the 10 barrels of oil.

Mr. LENROOT. Who is going to pay the tax?

Mr. SMOOT. It all depends upon where it goes.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the Senator's amendment, who is going to pay the tax?

Mr. SMOOT. The producer will pay it.

Mr. LENROOT. How is the producer going to know?

Mr. SMOOT. He knows that he has put 10 barrels of oil in there, and he knows that he draws out at the other end 10 barrels, and that is what he pays the tax on.

Mr. LENROOT. No; that depends on the purpose for which it is used. If it goes to a refinery there is no tax. If it goes to be used as fuel it is taxed.

Mr. SMOOT. He knows where it goes. There is not any doubt about it at all.

Mr. LENROOT. Let us see. I own an oil well, and I sell the product of that oil well to a man who owns a pipe line. Do I know where that oil is going and what it is going to be used for? Can I find out?

Mr. SMOOT. You will take a certificate if you do not pay the tax, because you are responsible for it. You will always be responsible for it unless you hold that certificate, and somebody will pay that tax. If it goes into the refining of oil, as over 80 per cent of it does, we all know that there is no tax to be paid upon it, because the tax is paid upon the manufactured and refined oil.

Mr. LENROOT. I see. Then the Senator's position is that a producer or a manufacturer must pay the tax unless he can prove that it was used for a further process of manufacture.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose that at the other end of the pipe line one-half of it goes to a refiner and one-half goes to a fuel consumer; which one of the two men who put it in at the beginning pays the tax?

Mr. SMOOT. It is very easily stated. In the case of the oil that goes to the refiner, the refiner pays the tax.

Mr. LENROOT. But suppose he sells to the pipe liner and the man who owns the pipe line sells half of it to one and half of it to the other?

Mr. SMOOT. Then he has credit for whatever he pays, and no more. In that case the tax is imposed only on one-half of the oil, and the certificate is given; and he has to prove, under the regulations of the department, just where it went before ever he is released of the responsibility for paying it.

Mr. LENROOT. Granting that the Senator's statement is true, how he simplifies the tax law by this process! Does he not? There is a multitude of regulations, granting that they can be administered in view of the uncertainty of the tax and the uncertainty of the use to which a commodity is put, to determine whether it is liable to a tax; and yet the Senator says he is "simplifying" the tax law.

Mr. President, I want to go on a little further.

Subdivision (c), on page 4 of the Senator's amendment, provides:

> If any person who manufactures, produces, or imports any commodity taxable under this title (1) sells, leases, or licenses such commodity to a corporation affiliated with such person within the meaning of section 240 of this act at less than the fair market price obtainable therefor, the tax thereon shall be computed on the basis of the price at which such commodity is sold, leased, or licensed by such affiliated corporation; and (2) if any such person sells, leases, or licenses such commodity, whether through any agreement, arrangement, or understanding, or otherwise, at less than the fair market price obtainable therefor, either, first, in such manner as directly or indirectly to benefit such person or any person directly or indirectly interested in the business of such person, or, second, with intent to cause such benefit, the amount for which such commodity is sold, leased, or licensed shall be taken to be the amount which would have been received from the sale, lease, or license of such commodity if sold, leased, or licensed at the fair market price obtainable therefor.

Mr. SMOOT. That is what we have in this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; that is true; but now you come to apply it to a sales tax, applying to every commodity, and right here I want to say that under this bill there are 15 commodities affected by the excise taxes. There will be 255, or seventeen times as many, under the Senator's amendment. We will have to have an army of inspectors in addition to those that we have to-day.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question, as he seems to have gone thoroughly into this matter. What do you do with an industry, for instance, like a blast furnace, where you have by-product ovens that produce comparatively finished products, such as toluol, coal-tar products, and slag, as well as pig iron?

Mr. LENROOT. Under the Senator's amendment it will have to be determined whether it is to be used in a further process of manufacture or whether it is to be used in the condition in which it comes from the factory—another of the uncertainties of this "simplification" of the tax law.

Mr. President, I want to go just one step further and call attention to subdivision (d), which provides that—

> Every individual, firm, or corporation liable for any tax imposed under this title shall make monthly returns under oath in duplicate and pay the taxes imposed by such title to the collector for the district in which is located the principal place of business. Such returns shall contain such information and be made in such time and place and in such manner as the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.
> (e) Taxes levied under this title shall, without assessment by the commissioner or notice from the collector, be due and payable to the collector at the time fixed for filing the return.

That is, under the Senator's amendment the manufacturer is to make a return every month of everything sold by him, and in that return he must show what has been sold for use or consumption and what has been sold for the purpose of manufacture. It exacts an impossibility for any manufacturer who sells products to a broker or to a wholesaler. He can not know the ultimate use to which his product is put, whether it is to be used or consumed or whether it is to go into another process of manufacture, yet he must know, under the Senator's amendment. Let us see what happens if he does not know. The amendment provides:

> If the tax is not paid when due, there shall be added as part of the tax a penalty of 5 per cent, together with interest at the rate of 1 per cent for each full month, from the time when the tax becomes due.

In other words, if it is found that he entirely innocently has not included some sale because he thought the article sold was to be used for further process of manufacture, but it is determined by the department it was in fact used for consumption, a 5 per cent penalty is imposed upon him, together with 1 per cent interest per month.

If this should ever be adopted, Mr. President, when the manufacturers of this country came to realize what this amendment would do to them and the way it would complicate their returns I venture to say there would not be a manufacturer in the United States who would favor it.

I am going to take only a few moments more, although I might talk upon this all afternoon. In conclusion I want to say that some time ago some friends of mine taught me a new game called "Put and take." Some other Senators may be familiar with it.

I took but one lesson, because I found it so expensive that I could not afford any further education in that game; but this amendment of the Senator from Utah is very much a put-and-take proposition—put on the consumer, who is already burdened, and take taxes off of those who are well able to pay. Just to illustrate, the Senator's amendment would put a tax upon bread and take it off of corporations, in part; would put a tax upon butter and take it off stockbrokers; would put a tax upon sugar and take it off playing cards; would put a tax upon coffee and take it off sales of stock; would put a tax upon tea and take the tax off pawnbrokers; would put a tax on clothing and take it off billiard rooms; would put a tax on shoes and take it off the use of yachts and pleasure boats; would take it off club dues and put it on stockings. I might go on at great length showing the taxes the Senator from Utah proposes to take off those who are well able to pay and to put on the masses of the consumers of this country.

Mr. President, I have favored eliminating some of these so-called nuisance taxes. I would like to eliminate them all if we could; but I am not willing to take off a single one of those taxes and put the tax upon somebody else less able to pay, and that is what the amendment of the Senator from Utah would do. I hope, Mr. President, the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that last statement is a very poor argument against the sales tax, when you take into consideration the fact that the Senator from Wisconsin was the leader of the bloc that brought in so many amendments removing the tax from certain articles, which amendments have been adopted. I will state some of the articles which will be nontaxable under the amendments the Senator supported.

Is there any difference between a billiard table and a pool table? Is there any difference between a billiard table and dice, or roulette wheels and things of that sort? The tax has been taken off those by the vote of the Senator.

Mr. LENROOT. I have just stated that in voting to take the tax off those things I did not vote to put it on a taxpayer who would be less able to pay, and the Senator does that in his amendment. That is the difference between the Senator from Utah and me.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator voted to take the tax off those things and then to put the tax on the net earnings of a corporation, for instance, and all the other taxes that are imposed here, because it has to fall on them all alike, not on one alone. The tax on chewing gum went out. On what goods did it fall? On every item in the bill in proportion to the loss.

Mr. LENROOT. Is there an increase of tax upon an item in this bill other than in the tax proposed by the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have stated my way of raising this revenue, and I am not going to repeat at this time all of the taxes which have been eliminated from this bill. I have stated that this afternoon, and I am not going to repeat it.

But photographic accessories and apparatus and films, and all expensive candies costing over 40 cents a pound, are freed from taxation, meaning a loss of $8,000,000. How is that $8,000,000 to be raised? Electric fans, thermos bottles, all sorts of smoking articles, are relieved of taxation. Guns for hunting and other purposes are relieved. Nine million dollars is lost by the removal of the tax on furs. Toilet articles and numerous other articles are relieved of taxation. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to mention them all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the amendment of the Senator from Utah involves two special features. It is something more than a mere sales tax. The first part of the amendment is directed to a proposed change in the tax on corporations which has been adopted by the Senate. Under the provisions of the bill, as passed on by the Senate, corporations are to pay a flat tax of 15 per cent.

The Senator from Utah has pointed out a very grave injustice which would be done to many of the corporations of this country if the bill as now amended should become law. He has pointed out that all corporations which earn 11 per cent or less upon their invested capital will have their taxes increased. Those which will earn 10 per cent or less will have their taxes increased 50 per cent. Those corporations which earn more than those percentages will have their taxes reduced.

A few days ago I discussed somewhat in detail what I conceived to be the abominations of such a proposal. I thought it was unwise. I pointed out as best I could how unjust it was to reduce the taxes of those corporations which are making large percentages upon their invested capital, and to increase the taxes of those which were making a small percentage.

The Senator from Utah undertakes to somewhat relieve that situation by proposing an amendment which has nothing whatever to do with the sales tax provision, and which ought to be considered wholly apart from any consideration of the other features of the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. That is an amendment of the bill as a whole, and it is to be treated as one amendment. That is the reason I offered it the way I did.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I can understand the reason why the Senator put it in here, because he was modifying the taxes under section 230 of this bill and proposing other amendments to the bill. I think perhaps the object which the Senator from Utah had in mind is not wholly without merit. I think he wanted to relieve a very vexatious situation and remove what I conceive to be an indefensible hardship which this bill, as it now stands, proposes to put upon corporations earning modest percentages of income upon their invested capital. I do not believe the bill as it now stands can be defended upon any theory of taxation.

The Senator from Utah seeks to meet the situation in a very peculiar way. I did not hear the whole of the colloquy which took place between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] regarding this bill, but I wish to point out one factor which I did not hear the Senator from Wisconsin bring out. He may have done so, but I was called away regarding some other matters and did not hear the whole of that colloquy. I did hear some of the criticisms of the Senator from Wisconsin, which I thought were well taken. I thought the language of this proposed amendment justified those of his criticisms which I heard. I am not sure but that he made the further criticism which occurs to me. I will read that proviso again. It reads:

For each calendar year thereafter—

That is, after the year 1921, when the excess-profits tax is taken away—

15 per cent of such excess amount.

That is the language of the bill as it now stands approved by the Senate.

Then the Senator from Utah adds this proviso:

Provided, however, That if the average income and war or excess-profits taxes paid by any corporation for the three years next preceding have amounted to 10 per cent or less of the average net income of the corporation for those years, the tax shall be 10 per cent of such excess amount.

I recall the criticism which the Senator from Wisconsin made to this provision when he said that unless they paid an excess-profits tax the whole rate was bound to be 10 per cent on the average, and it could not be anything else. I shall not discuss that any further than to call attention to the fact that if one of these corporations ever falls in that class, ever reaches the time when during the preceding years it has not paid beyond an average of 10 per cent, and once gets in that class, then it is forever in that class, because if we find an average of 10 per cent at all for one period, then it only pays 10 per cent, and therefore in any subsequent year it could not be made to pay more than 10 per cent.

Mr. LENROOT. That was the whole point of my objection, that once in that class it never could get out of it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I quite agree with the Senator's view.

Mr. SMOOT. As I said to the Senator from Wisconsin, this amendment was drawn for me by an attorney. I asked that the amendment be drawn to do just exactly what I stated it was to do. There is still a question about it. I am going to change the language so there can not be any question about it at all, and that I think can be very easily done. So far as discussion of this point is concerned, the Senator from New Mexico wants to do just what I want to do, and I want the wording of this so there will be no question between the Senator from New Mexico and myself on it.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. If the idea of the Senator from Utah shall be clothed in language to carry out his purpose, it seems to me that he is drawing a line which is purely arbitrary. It is not based on what I think ought to be done. Suppose a corporation paid a little more than 10 per cent on the average, say 10.5, then you are going to make it pay thereafter 15 per cent because it happens to get over the line a little beyond the 10 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be for one year, and yet the next year it may not be over the line, and in the average of three years it may fall under the 10 per cent.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. But in the case of the corporation which averages for the three years a little over 10 per cent, then the Senator at once increases its taxes by 50 per cent, simply because, through the excess-profits tax or the payment of 15 per cent for one year, it on the average would pay a tax of a little over 10 per cent. The Senator would at once increase the tax by 50 per cent simply because of the small increase in the tax paid.

Mr. LENROOT. There is the other side of it. The corporation, once in the 15 per cent class, never could get into the 10 per cent class, no matter how low it might fall.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I think the Senator is quite right, but I am assuming the Senator from Utah will change his amendment so as to carry out what he claims to be its intent.

Mr. LENROOT. What I mean is that it will have to be changed both ways.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes; it will have to be changed both ways in order to do that. But even if it operates precisely as the Senator from Utah thinks that it should operate, we still are left in a very peculiar predicament regarding the revenues to be derived from this measure. I listened to the colloquy between the Senator from Utah and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I must say I indorse everything stated by the Senator from North Carolina. I can not see how the result can be otherwise than as he stated.

I have here these estimates. Taking the bill just as it is now, just as the various titles have been amended to date by the Senate, we find this result.

Title V regarding transportation has been so amended by the Senate that it will produce even yet, with freight transportation and certain other matters eliminated, $27,000,000. That has been eliminated by the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

The title upon beverages, as it has been amended, would still produce $34,000,000.

The title on admissions and so on as at present amended would produce $90,000,000 of revenue.

Title IX, the one upon automobiles, as amended would produce $158,580,000.

The stamp-tax provision would still produce $48,500,000.

The special taxes in Title X would still produce $12,000,000.

These make a total of $370,080,000 that these titles as they have been amended would produce in revenue. Clearly, all that is wiped out by the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Under the amendment of the Senator from Utah the corporation tax would amount to this: All those corporations which have paid 10 per cent or less of their capital stock for the three years would not pay any more than 10 per cent for the taxable year, although they should make greater earnings. They would only pay the 10 per cent even though other corporations were paying 15 per cent.

The flat tax of 5 per cent upon all those corporations amounts to $220,000,000 a year. That much revenue is lost, and the Senator from Utah leaves the 15 per cent tax only upon those corporations which do not come within his three-year period, but in that process of figuring there is a loss of a considerable amount. The amount that is lost is $134,000,000; that is, instead of the additional 5 per cent raising $220,000,000, as it would in the blanket or flat tax of 15 per cent, with the modification which the Senator from Utah proposes, there would be a loss from that $220,000,000 of $134,000,000. Adding all these losses together makes a total loss of revenue under this provision of the Senator from Utah of $504,000,000. That is the absolutely admitted and inescapable loss of revenue under the Senator's amendment.

The Senator proposes to levy this sales tax, and under his own statement it seems that he can only hope to raise $253,000,000 a year. In other words, there would be an absolute loss of revenue under his provision to the extent of about $250,000,000 a year. If we did not need that revenue and his substitute provision were advisable and did not meet with objection, we might be content to adopt it, but it is conceded by everybody that we are trying to raise revenue and as much revenue as is possible.

I come now to the operation of the amendment of the Senator from Utah. There are certain principles which should be controlling in the levying of all taxes. These are more important at this juncture, at this period of our history, than at any other time. As I said some days ago, the country at this time, so far as its business activities are concerned, is more depressed than perhaps it will be for years to come. We all hope that we are at the low ebb; that next year business will be a little better, the next year still a little bit better, and so on. We are not only at the low ebb in our prosperity, as I believe, but at this particular time the burdens of government are necessarily much heavier than they will be next year and the next year after that.

We have a number of extraordinary expenditures which we must meet, such as the rehabilitation of the soldiers, vocational education, and various other things to which I might refer, calling for extraordinary expenditures at this time. With those extraordinary expenditures, with the depression in business, it does seem to me that there should be left nothing undone which possibly can be done in order to equalize the burden of taxation and to put it upon those who are best able to pay. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah violates both of those fundamental principles.

Mr President, much has been said here upon the question of whether or not these taxes are passed on to the consumer. I do not know that it is advisable to make any extended argument upon that question, because it has been fully discussed, but evidently there are those of absolutely different minds upon the subject. I wish to make just a few statements regarding it to see if we can not clarify the situation to some extent at least.

Take the excess-profits tax paid by corporations, and let us see whether it is passed on to the consumer or not and whether the flat tax on net incomes is passed on.

Now, let us see. The manufacturer or the corporation pays the income tax. The manufacturer is dealing in a given commodity; if the price of that commodity is being lowered, it must be evident to everybody that he forgets about the tax and is going to get all that he can get, anyway. If he is selling in a declining market, there is no question that he is simply endeavoring to get all that he can, and he considers the excess-profits tax or other taxes no more than he considers any other cost. He is getting all that he can; he charges all that the trade will bear. In that case it can not be said that he is passing on anything to the consumer.

In another contingency, take any commodity where there is competition, it makes no difference that there is a tax paid. Several concerns are competing; it may be that one manufacturer does not pay the excess-profits tax at all, while another does; but they must sell at the same price. The excess-profits tax in that case is not considered at all, because they are each charging the consumer all that they can get in view of the demand and the severity of the competition. So in neither of those cases can it be said that the excess-profits tax or any other tax is passed on to the consumer or raises the price of the commodity to the consumer any higher than it would be if no tax at all were paid. The manufacturer is simply getting all that the trade or the traffic will bear; all that he can get. He is forced to do that in the one case because of the lack of demand and in the other case because of strong competition.

It has been suggested that in a rising market the situation is different, that the tax is passed on to the consumer. Mr. President, just imagine a rising market, where it is claimed that the tax is passed on. Let us see about that. When there is a rising market what does the seller do? Does he increase his price because he has more cost, because he has more taxes to pay, or does he increase his price because he can get a higher price?

It seems to me that in every case the price of the commodity is based upon the demand for it at the price which the seller is willing to take. It can not be said in any given instance that we know that the tax has been passed on to the consumer. The statistics upon that subject would seem to bear out that contention. I wish now to call attention to just a few facts:

During the war—

According to the "History of Prices During the War," published by the War Industries Board—prices rose less in England and the United States, which imposed heavy excess-profits taxes, than in France, Germany, and other countries which used the tax with less vigor or not at all.

I may say that I am reading from a series of articles brought together in pamphlet form by Dr. Adams, who is the tax expert of the Treasury Department:

(2) In this country the movement of prices has borne no intelligible relation to the excess-profits tax. Prices rose more in the 12 months preceding the adoption of the excess-profits tax of October 3, 1917, than in the 12 months following its adoption. The same is true of uncontrolled prices—

The first figures relate to prices which were controlled by the Industries Board, but as to the uncontrolled prices—

the index number of which rose 31 per cent from October, 1916, to October, 1917, and only 20 per cent from October, 1917, to October, 1918. Prices rose less rapidly after the adoption of the excess-profits tax than they did before it was introduced.

3. Prices did not fall when the rates of the profits tax were reduced from the 30–65–80 per cent schedules of 1918 to the 20–40 per cent schedule of 1919.

There was a reduction of the excess-profits tax of more than one-half, and notwithstanding that reduction, the prices of commodities did not fall, but, on the contrary, prices were higher in 1919 than in 1918.

So statistics do not bear out the contention which has been made. It must be apparent that prices are governed by the law of supply and demand. I want to emphasize that point by this reference: If there is any such thing as a business conscience, if when prices are rising higher and higher and there comes a time when the business man says that he is getting all that he ought to take, it does seem to me that he would have been controlled by that conscience during the progress of the late World War. The people were all making sacrifices from one end of the country to the other; we were all trying to win the war; the Government was needing revenue; the Government in many ways was seeking to control prices; many commodities were put under absolute legal control, for the reason that if they had not been under control it was thought that the prices would have gone beyond the point of a reasonable profit.

Take all of the commodities that were put under control; the prices being fixed by the War Industries Board were fixed at such a high point that all producers were permitted to make at least a reasonable profit; even the high-cost concerns were permitted to charge such prices as would return to them a reasonable profit; but the commodities which were not controlled mounted higher and higher, showing that in the business world during that time of stress there was no conscience which would put a limit upon the price which manufacturers would charge for their commodities; that they would charge as high prices as they could get in order to dispose of the supply which they had. The law of supply and demand controlled. I submit that the excess-profits tax or other income tax had absolutely nothing to do with the increased cost of living. The manufacturers would have charged the prices, anyway.

Mr. President, it may be said, if that is so, if these taxes are not passed on, that the people of the country do not suffer. I have argued that they are not passed on. There are many people in the country who believe they are passed on, but I do not believe that any economist in the country has ever justified the assertion made this afternoon by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]—his statement being made upon information furnished him by some one else—that the excess-profits taxes raised prices 23 and a fraction per cent. I do not believe that any economist in the land can justify any such statement as that. The theory upon which that statement was made is absolutely unsound; it has no economic foundation. I should like to go into a discussion of that; but it seems to me that it is not necessary to do so, because I do not believe that anybody would undertake to reason out how the thing could be done; at least nobody on the floor of the Senate has undertaken to do so. A tax upon the price of a commodity may operate differently.

Let us assume that some of these taxes are passed on.

I believe that the general and accepted theory of most of the people of the country is that in a falling market or in a competitive market taxes are not passed on, but that in a rising market they are passed on. I suppose there are more people in the country who will accept that than perhaps any other general statement on the subject. Even, however, if the proposed sales tax should not be passed on, it would violate both of the fundamental principles of taxation to which I have referred; and, if it should be passed on, it would violate the same fundamental principles.

Now, let us for a moment consider that the tax is not passed on but that the manufacturer pays it. Then, we have the situation presented here this afternoon by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that some concerns would be paying as much of a tax as 50 per cent or 60 per cent or more upon their total net income. Let me give an illustration of how that would work out, perhaps not in the degree the Senator stated to-day, but the principle which he announced is fully justified. Suppose there is a concern that upon a sale of $100,000 of its products has a net income of $20,000, and another concern selling $400,000 worth of a similar commodity has the same net income—$20,000. What is the tax? The first concern will pay only 1 per cent on the $100,000, or $1,000; the other concern will have to pay 4 per cent, or $4,000; in the one case one pays an income tax of $1,000 while the other, upon the same amount of income, pays $4,000. It is an absolute discrimination as between those concerns; it is unequal; it violates the very fundamental principle of equality which ought to underlie every tax which we place upon the people of the country. Moreover, in every case where the concern is making the smaller profit it has to pay the same percentage of tax as if it were making a large profit. That violates the principle of putting the tax upon those who are best able to pay.

When the other side of the question is considered, suppose we say that the tax is passed on; then we violate the fundamental principle in perhaps a higher degree than where it is not passed on. In that case you are taxing every consumer alike.

We have thought that in the levy of our income taxes there should be a graduation, and that the tax should be so graduated as to put the burden upon those who are best able to pay. In our income tax we have provided that certain individuals shall not pay any tax. If the individual is a single man with an income of only $1,000, we felt that he ought not to pay an income tax at all. If he is a married man with an income of $2,000, we felt that he ought not to pay any income tax; and why? Because it was thought that to put any tax upon people with those modest incomes would be a burden; it would be a greater burden than to put a much higher tax upon those with higher incomes. It was assumed that every dollar taken out of those amounts would be taken from the necessaries of life which the individual ought to have, and so we decided that we would not put any tax upon those people, that there should be an absolute exemption. When, however, we come to such a tax as this sales tax, if it is passed on, it is imposing a tax upon the necessities of life which enter into every household, no matter how humble.

Moreover, take the family where there are no children, and the families where there are different numbers of children. You find a different degree of taxation upon those families by reason of that fact. You do not want to do it. Another way in which the principle is violated is this: When we come to levy a tax upon the individual we say that those with an income of $5,000 shall pay so much surtax; those with an income of $10,000 shall pay at a higher rate; those with an income of $100,000 or $1,000,000 a year shall pay at a still higher rate; but this tax, if it is passed on, is borne at the same rate by everybody, regardless of ability to pay.

I submit, therefore, that this so-called sales tax is violative of every principle on which revenue legislation should be founded. It is absolutely indefensible from the standpoint of justice to the individual citizens of this country, and I am sure that the Congress does not want to do an injustice if it can find some other means of raising the revenue of the country That would be the effect of the amendment of the Senator from Utah, as I believe. He is proposing to substitute that sort of a thing for these other taxes. He proposes to supplant the taxes to which I am now going to refer by a general sales tax.

Here is a tax upon these so-called soft drinks, these cereal beverages, and that sort of thing, upon photographic films, the small tax of 3 per cent upon candy, a tax upon firearms and knives, and so forth, a tax upon cigarette holders and pipes, automatic slot vending machines, liveries, and so forth, hunting and shooting guns, yachts and motor boats, and other luxuries, jewelry, perfumes, and cosmetics. Those are the taxes which this bill levies now. They are either luxuries or nonessential articles. Bear that in mind. There is not an article mentioned there, on which the bill as it is now framed imposes a tax, which is essential to life. They are luxuries, or nonessentials of life. In order to avoid a tax upon such commodities as those, the Senator from Utah proposes to put a blanket tax upon practically all commodities, including the actual necessaries of life.

I do not intend to discuss at length at this time the administrative difficulties, although they are numerous. They have been discussed at length by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and I have not the slightest doubt but that the Treasury Department would be absolutely swamped in the administration of this law.

If I may say just a few words upon that subject, the Treasury Department to-day, so far as income taxes are concerned, are still auditing the taxes of 1917. They have three years' taxes since then which are almost entirely unaudited, the reason being that it is impossible, it seems, to procure the help, the assistance, in order to make the audit. Those audits are bringing into the Treasury from $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 a month—such audits as they have been making—going back practically to the year 1917. When you go into the field of taxes of 1918 and 1919, when profits were higher than they had ever been, when the inducement was greater than ever before to try to hide these profits, I surmise that the revenue which will come in from month to month will be even greater than at the present time; but it is coming in now at the rate of $30,000,000 to $40,000,000 a month, and in the report upon this bill the committee estimates that for this year and for next year there will be not less than $300,000,000 coming in on readjustment of income taxes.

That is for 1917. Bringing it down to 1918 and 1919, you will get more revenue; but it means that if the Treasury Department were able to do it, it would be getting in all of that revenue now. It would not spread it out over a series of years. It would try to get it all now, because no official would be justified in deferring the audit of anybody's account simply because he wanted to put off the day of collection. They are doing all the work they can do. When you impose upon the Treasury Department this additional duty of checking up the accounts of every merchant and manufacturer in the land, I should like to know where you expect to come out.

Not only that, but this law provides for reports and payment of tax every month in the year. If we have all this other trouble with income taxes which are paid upon an adjustment only once a year, how much greater would the trouble be if the department had to audit and adjust accounts 12 times a year? It is inconceivable that the Treasury Department can do anything of the kind.

The result would be that there would be no checking system. You would have to leave it to the honesty of the individual taxpayer. You would find general tax evasion. One man would find that his competitor was not paying the tax; he would conclude that he could not pay it, and you would have general demoralization and violation of the law.

Assuming, however, that the administrative difficulties are not nearly so great as I have stated, it must be apparent to everybody that the administrative difficulties increase with every multiplication of items which are to be taxed. That must be self-evident to everybody. What should be done under these circumstances? I would not put any tax upon sales of commodities, even luxuries, if I could avoid it, but it is evident that we shall have to put a tax upon some kinds of commodities.

Then what is the thing to do? There is only one answer, and that is to put that tax upon nonessentials, upon luxuries, and, owing to the administrative difficulties, I would select as few of those commodities as I could, and I would put the tax high enough so that they would bring in the requisite amount of revenue.

As I said, I should like to see the tax on all these commodities taken off, but it is evident that if you are going to repeal the excess-profits tax, as the majority of the Senate have decided they will do, then you are forced to do this thing. You are forced to put a tax upon commodities, and, being so forced, it strikes me that there is only one logical and reasonable way in which to do it, and that is to tax as few commodities as possible, and let them be luxuries or nonessentials; but under no circumstances would I lay the heavy hand of taxation upon the bread which feeds the mouths of the indigent and the children of this country. I would not put it upon necessaries. I would not let anybody who has been reaping a profit during this war retain one dollar of it if I had to put a tax upon those necessaries of life. I would reach the other source. Under no circumstances would I say that this great, big, glorious country of ours has gotten so low in its resources and in its legislative ingenuity and intelligence as to make it necessary to tax the food and clothing that the poor must have.

TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS—KILLING OF PVT. FRANK W. FREY.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this morning the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] placed in the RECORD an article which described the bayoneting of a New Jersey soldier in France. Feeling that possibly there might be something inferred from the statement to the effect that I had not done my duty in investigating the matter, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the first information I had of this regrettable occurrence was on July 29, 1919, when the Jersey Journal, a New Jersey paper, sent me a letter inquiring if I would make a statement in regard to the Frey case. The next day I received a letter from a prominent banker in the State, inclosing a copy of the article in the Jersey Journal, and asking me if an investigation would be made. I immediately wired the Jersey Journal that the case had just been brought to my attention and that I would take it up with the War Department.

I then addressed a letter to the Secretary of War, Mr. Baker, which read as follows:

Permit me to invite your attention to the inclosed article which has been sent to me by the Jersey Journal, the leading newspaper of Jersey City.

If this statement is a truthful and correct narrative, it certainly presents a shocking state of affairs. I beg to urge a prompt and drastic investigation with a view to determining what the exact facts are and to the end that proper punishment should be inflicted upon those guilty of the gross brutality charged.

I received a reply on August 7 from Frank B. Davis, of the office of the Secretary of War, in which the Secretary acknowledged the receipt of my letter.

Later I received a statement from the Inspector General, which had been predated August 4, 1919, which was a reply to a communication addressed to the Secretary of War by Mr. Tumulty, Secretary to the President. That communication was dated July 31, 1919, and asked for the facts regarding the death of Pvt. Frank W. Frey, including the Inspector General's report.

I will read only the concluding paragraphs, which are as follows:

A board of officers was at once convened to investigate the occurrence. Its finding were that the bayonet wound which caused the death of Pvt. Frey was inflicted by the sentry in discharge of his duty and that the death of the deceased was not in line of duty but as a result of his own misconduct.

Notwithstanding the findings of the board, the sentry was tried by general court-martial. During his trial the sentry testified that he did not intend to kill Pvt. Frey; that he only intended to wound him slightly; that his aim was spoiled on account of the pack he was carrying on his back and on account of the blouse which was folded under his belt on the right side. The finding of the court in the case of the sentry was "not guilty," and he was given a full and honorable acquittal, which was approved by the reviewing authority.

I sent that report to the Jersey Journal immediately upon its receipt. The report was not returned, and I to-day procured a copy from the War Department.

I desire to file these papers with the special committee authorized by the Senate to investigate this matter, and therefore will turn them over to that committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The papers will be referred as requested.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I suppose we shall vote in a short time upon the Smoot amendment, and I do not desire to take more than a very few minutes in expressing myself upon that amendment at this hour.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] stated that the farm organizations throughout the country are opposed to this form of taxation. I believe his statement to be entirely accurate, but if I am to pass judgment upon whether it is a better method of taxation than those contained in the bill, I shall have to base it upon my own investigation of the matter irrespective of the views of any propagandists who are seeking it or of those who think it will impose a hardship upon them.

Mr. LENROOT. My only reference to that was in reply to the statement of the Senator from Utah that three-fourths of the people in the United States favor it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from Wisconsin is absolutely correct in his position. I am quite certain that the vast majority of the people of my State are opposed to this amendment.

I think those favoring the amendment lose sight of the fundamental proposition that is behind every tax scheme. If we want to raise a billion dollars from corporations or individuals engaged in the production or handling of anything that is consumed by the American public, that billion dollars will be attached to the final selling price of the commodity purchased, and the ultimate consumer will pay that tax no matter whether it is represented by an excess-profits tax or a tax upon corporate stock. In whatever form it is presented, it will be paid by the American consumer.

Of course, there may be times in a falling market when the producer or the dealer can not pass it on, but if he fails to pass it on this year, you may be pretty sure he will pass it on at the first opportunity, and make good his loss. So, year in and year out, under normal conditions, the ultimate consumer of every product handled by a corporation or an individual who pays a tax upon business will pay that tax to the person who conducts the business.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, in reenforcement of what the Senator is saying, the only question really at issue is not whether the consumer should pay a tax which is a burden levied upon commerce on its way from the producer to the consumer but whether he should pay it once or twice or three times, and the chief objection to indirect taxation is that it gives an opportunity not only to add the tax in the first instance, but to add the tax plus the profit in the second instance, and then the tax plus the profit in the third instance, and so on.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is probably right, but I think all these taxes, as they originate at the source, are pyramided, no matter in what form we levy them, and the only question the ultimate consumer is interested in is not so much the amount of the tax but how it will affect him individually, whether he will pay the most tax under this form or under the other form. So I think that the people of my State will pay the tax no matter in what form it is levied. If we levy a tax of a billion dollars on the railroads which carry the products of the farm and the products which the farmer consumes, no matter in what way the tax is imposed, those who consume the articles which are transported are bound to pay that tax.

But, Mr. President, without going too deeply into the merits of this particular method of taxation, I think it is inappropriate at the present time. I do not think it ought to be attached to this bill. We have spent months, through long days and into the night hours, discussing the bill, before the committee and before the Senate. We have evolved a certain method of taxation which will take care of our obligations for the next fiscal year, we believe.

It is proposed by this amendment to cut out of the bill three-fourths, we will say, of the things we have so long labored upon, and cover them by a single proposition known as the sales tax, or the manufacturers' tax.

Suppose the House should fail to adopt this amendment? Suppose we should not get an agreement on the part of the House to accept this proposition? Then in what situation would we be? We would have discarded all those things which have taken months, working day and night, to agree to and include in the bill; and therefore we would have to go to the House upon the simplified proposition which the Senator offers, and if the House refused to accept that, then we would have to reattach those things which we must detach in order to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Utah. Then we would have to bring the matter before the Senate again and we would have to go all over it again. I believe that if we should adopt the amendment of the Senator from Utah it would not pass through the House, and we would have to go over this proposition again.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if my amendment were agreed to the whole question would go into conference. The only thing the Senate will have done would be to strike out some of the items which were in the bill as it passed the House. So, if the amendment were agreed to as I have offered it, everything would go to conference, if the bill were passed as it is now amended.

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; but we would have to go into conference upon the subject matter of each of these matters which have been stricken out, and which we have once put into the bill and have adopted in Committee of the Whole, and it would bring that matter back into the Senate, and the whole thing would be reargued over and over again upon a motion to concur in any amendment suggested by the conferees.

Mr. SMOOT. I think if the Senator would consider that again he would not make that statement, because my amendment does not interfere with any of the amendments made by the Senate other than those items which are stricken out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Those are the ones I am speaking of.

Mr. SMOOT. All there is in that is that the Senate has stricken out the House amendments. So all the House provisions and all the amendments the Senate has acted upon will be in conference.

Mr. McCUMBER. Except those stricken out by the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to be captious in the matter, but if my amendment is accepted all amendments to every other title of the bill will be exactly the same as in the bill as it passed the House, and the amendments which are stricken out will be in conference, providing for the same rates as when the bill passed the House, except in one or two cases. They will be in conference, because it will be the bill as it passed the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the whole subject will be reopened in conference and in the Senate itself.

There is another reason why I think it is improper at this time. The Senator from Utah may disagree with me upon it, but the experts of the department say that there will be a loss of at least $251,000,000 if his amendment is agreed to; that is, by making allowance for these things which are cut out by the Senator's amendment and then giving the Senator credit for everything that he claims by his amendment. They do not believe that we will receive the amount which he thinks he will get from his amendment, and therefore that the deficit will be more than $251,000,000. Again, if it goes into conference with that deficit, we have got to find some other method outside of those which have been stricken out or include them again to take care of this deficit.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, will the Senator let me ask him how much the experts whom he has consulted estimate will be brought in under the so-called manufacturers' tax of 1 per cent?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] gave it in the figures a short time ago. I do not have it accurately, but the difference left a deficit of about $251,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. But there is no deficit when we take all the other items into consideration as to raising the amount of money. That is only one statement and does not take into consideration the revenues to be raised from other sources. I will say to the Senator that the manufacturers' tax of 1 per cent, together with the taxes that are imposed elsewhere in the bill, will raise $4,033,000,000. If it was a turnover tax of one-half of 1 per cent, then it would raise $150,000,000 more.

Mr. McCUMBER. The actuary of the Treasury Department gave me his estimates, and at the time he gave me the figures on which he made the estimates I put it to him squarely, and he stated that there would be a loss of at least $251,000,000 if we adopted the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the Senator has been courteous enough to permit me to interrupt him. Will the Senator give me a little more light on that?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. McCORMICK. If I understand it correctly, the actuaries hold that although $250,000,000 will be brought in annually by the Smoot manufacturers' tax, the items eliminated will result in a gross loss of $500,000,000, and that therefore the total of revenue to be produced by the bill will be short $250,000,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. Something along about that figure.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senate, if the Senator from North Dakota will yield——

Mr. McCUMBER. They were given to me in a little different order. They first took the amount which will be lost by cutting out these things which are cut out and repealed by the amendments. Then they made allowance for the amount that would be received from the Smoot amendment on a 1 per cent tax. There would be a difference of $251,000,000 which would amount to a deficit that must be made up in some other way. If they are in error about that, it is up to the Senator to explain that error, but the Senator's amendment has not been modified since I put that question directly to the actuary.

I wish to say, in conclusion, that while I think the time is not far distant when, for purposes which I need not now discuss, it may become necessary to have a sales tax, I do not think and do not believe that this is just the time to put it into effect.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am going to take the opportunity now of putting into the RECORD the exact estimate that raises the $4,033,593,000. I will say that every one of these figures has been agreed to between myself and Mr. McCoy, not only the estimates that are made on H. R. 8245 as the bill was reported, but the estimates made under the Smoot plan.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Utah will make it clear, in conjunction with that table, that the revenue accruing from his proposed tax is estimated at $126,000,000 for the half year, at $250,000,000 for the whole year—that the mountain has labored and brought forth a mouse. The Smoot bill was to revolutionize the revenue system under which we have been living, to bring in $1,250,000,000, and now it seems it is to bring in $250,000,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator may state what he cares to about the bill, and I am not going to object to anything that he does say about it.

Mr. McCORMICK. If I have stated what is not true of it, I should welcome correction.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to put the figures in the RECORD that have been agreed upon without a question of doubt. What I am fearful of is that they have taken the calendar year of 1922, and not the fiscal year 1922, and it will make a great difference, as I stated before. What we have to do is to raise sufficient money for the fiscal year 1922 to pay the running expenses of the Government. The estimate for that purpose was $4,032,000, if I remember the exact figures.

How is it going to be raised? Individual income tax, $800,000,000. Corporation taxes, even at a flat 10 per cent rate, $460,000,000, and if it is raised above that by any amendment that may be offered, then there will be more than the amount which I state will be raised.

Profits taxes, $150,000,000. There are two profits taxes paid upon the business of 1920, one of them being September 15, 1921, and the other December 15, 1921, and the two will be for the calendar year January 15, 1922, and April 15, 1922. This amounts to $150,000,000, as agreed to by Mr. McCoy.

The back taxes would be $320,000,000. The customs tax will be $400,000,000.

Sales of surplus war supplies, $150,000,000. Miscellaneous revenue, $287,643,000. Estate taxes, $150,000,000. Tobacco tax, $250,000,000. Corporation stock, 10 per cent, $75,000,000, and that is all I have estimated. Alcohol tax as amended, $105,000,000. Narcotic tax, $20,200,000.

The six months from July 1, 1921, to January 1, 1922, will operate under existing law and we will collect $354,250,000. In addition to that we will have a manufacturers' sale tax for six months from January 1, 1922, to June 30, 1922, of $126,500,000.

If it were one-half of 1 per cent general turnover tax, the taxes on the nonintegrated companies, so as to equalize them with the integrated companies, would now be, as estimated, $450,000,000 a year.

The figures I have quoted total $4,033,593,000. If there was not an increase in those figures of any kind, there would be enough to pay the expenses estimated by the Treasury Department for the fiscal year of 1922.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, as an excuse for placing this burdensome and inexcusable sales tax upon everything that the producer has to buy, we are told that the producer passes on the cost of production to the consumer. If he can not do that, his business is a failure. He must do that if his business is to survive. But let me remind you that under your Republican administration the producer is now selling his produce in the market places of the country below the cost of production. He is utterly helpless and powerless to compel the manufacturer to pay him a price that will yield a profit. He can not obtain the money necessary to enable him to hold his produce off the market until the price will yield a profit. But after the producer is forced to throw his produce upon a low and unprofitable market the manufacturer gets it, and he can get all the money he needs to enable him to keep the finished product off the market until the price yields a satisfactory profit.

Under this process the producer is denied a profitable price and the finished product is frequently sold to the consumer at a price that is not at all justified by the price paid to the producer.

The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] made a speech that I wish could be heard by every man, woman, and child in the Republic. Mr. President, the American people furnished their sons and furnished the means to win the war. They borrowed money with which to buy bonds. Under the deflation policy of your Federal Reserve Board thousands and thousands of those bonds have been driven out of the hands of the original purchasers. Many of our people mortgaged their homes in order to obtain money to buy Government bonds. I wish to remind Senators of a time in the Holy Land when the people cried out against tax burdens grievous to be borne. There are conditions in this country under Republican rule that resemble the distressing conditions that existed in the Holy Land several centuries ago. We are told in the fifth chapter of Nehemiah that at that time the people said: "We have mortgaged our land, vineyards, and houses that we might buy corn. We have borrowed money for the king's tribute, and that upon our lands and vineyards."

To-day the farmers of the West have mortgaged their homes and their farms and their vineyards. Thousands of farmers in the South have done the same thing. Six millions of men are out of employment. They are having a hard time to live. The cotton price for the 1920 crop would not pay the fertilizer bill and the farmers' taxes. The farmers of the South are losing money on the present crop, and here you are seeking to impose a sales-tax burden upon them which will compel them to pay taxes on every necessity that they have to buy. I beg you, Senators, not to do that.

I beg the Republican leaders to abandon this unfair and unjust scheme of taxation. Do not take all that they have, but leave, I beg you, something for the rank and file of the American people to live upon.

Ill does it become you to vote to exempt from taxation the profiteers of the country and then place a tax upon the poor man's table and all the necessities of life.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, at the suggestion of certain Senators I wish again to state the facts with regard to the loss of revenue which would be involved by the adoption of the Smoot amendment.

I have said that the actuary of the Treasury had advised me that under the Smoot amendment we would lose from the corporation tax for the calendar year 1922 the sum of $134,000,000; that we would lose by the repeal of Titles V, IX, X, and XII the sum of $370,000,000, making a total loss of $504,000,000.

The Senator from Utah estimated that his amendment would raise $253,000,000. The actuary expressed the opinion that that was probably a little more than it would raise; but, taking that estimate to be correct, he estimates that the net loss in revenue for the calendar year 1922 would be $251,000,000.

Of course, the corporation tax, from which we sustain a loss of $134,000,000, is always based upon the earnings of the calendar year, and the taxes realized from the titles which are repealed would also be collected in the calendar year. However, the Senator from Utah said that the losses for the fiscal year would be different. He then expressed the opinion that I was speaking about the calendar year 1923, as distinguished from the fiscal year 1923. I requested the actuary to make an estimate of the effect upon the revenues for the fiscal year 1923.

This bill is intended to raise revenue for the fiscal year 1923 as well as for the fiscal year 1922. He estimates that for the fiscal year 1923 we would lose, as I previously contended, identically the same sum that we would lose for the calendar year 1922; in other words, he says we would lose on account of the change in the corporation income tax for the fiscal year 1923 the sum of $134,000,000, and that we should lose by the repeal of the four titles mentioned $370,000,000, making $504,000,000 that we would lose for the fiscal year 1923. Estimating that the income from the amendment would amount to what the Senator from Utah estimates it would amount to—that is, $253,000,000—the result would be a loss in revenue during the fiscal year 1923 of $251,000,000, the same estimates which were made based upon the calendar year 1923.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, for the RECORD I wish to put in at this time the exact estimate that has been agreed to by myself and the actuary, Mr. McCoy. We have not gone over the figures merely once, but we have gone over them several times. This statement is for the fiscal year 1923. The Treasury Department estimates that it will need a revenue of $3,400,000,000 for that fiscal year. Under the amendment this is how it will be raised, and there can be no doubt about it at all——

Mr. SIMMONS. How can that revenue be realized if we lose, according to the estimates, for the fiscal year the sum of $251,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator will be patient, I will tell him just how the necessary revenue will be raised; and I say that no Senator in the Chamber will say that we will not raise it under my amendment for that fiscal year. I am not talking about the calendar year 1923; I am talking about the fiscal year, and the estimate we have from the Treasury Department is for that year.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SMOOT. I will yield just as soon as I get through with the presentation of these figures, which I desire to complete my statement.

The income from surtaxes, instead of being $900,000,000, will be $800,000,000; the corporation tax, even at 10 per cent, will yield $460,000,000. That is all I have estimated, although the amendment which I have proposed will raise over $100,000,000 more, according to the statement made by Mr. McCoy. Yet he is charging it up as a loss against the estimates that I have made.

Mr. POMERENE. Will the Senator please again give the amount to be derived from the corporation tax?

Mr. SMOOT. The amount I estimate is $460,000,000, and from the profits tax $150,000,000. That amount will embrace the two last payments in the year 1922, which will be made on September 15, 1922, and December 15, 1922. The revenue derived from that source will be more than that, but I am not estimating to take one single cent more than the actuary allowed.

From customs duties the revenue will be $400,000,000; from the sale of surplus war materials, $150,000,000; miscellaneous revenue, $287,643,000; estate taxes $150,000,000; tobacco taxes, $250,000,000; the corporation tax only $75,000,000—that is, a straight 10 per cent tax—the alcohol tax, $105,000,000; miscellaneous taxes, narcotic taxes, and so forth, $20,200,000; the 1 per cent sales manufacturers' tax, $253,500,000. All those taxes total $3,411,343,000; and the Treasury Department say that they will need $3,400,000,000 for the fiscal year 1923.

I want these figures to stand in the RECORD alongside of those which have been put there by the Senator from North Carolina. I say these figures are right, and, if that is all the money the Government requires, that is all it ought to have. The amendment will raise the amount of revenue which it is estimated will be needed.

Mr. POMERENE, Mr. McCORMICK, and Mr. SIMMONS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Utah yields the floor, and recognizes the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask a question. Is the amount of revenue which the Senator from Utah gives as being raised from customs duties based upon the present law or upon the tariff bill which is now in the Finance Committee?

Mr. SMOOT. Under the present law, on the basis of the preceding year, the revenue from customs duties would be $275,000,000, and under the proposed new tariff law it would be $400,000,000, or $125,000,000 more under the proposed new law than under the present law.

Mr. FLETCHER. How much would be raised by the income tax?

Mr. SMOOT. From the income tax $100,000,000 less than now, or $800,000,000 in all.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. McCORMICK. Before the Senator from Utah finishes what he has to say in connection with the proposal which has been under discussion, let me ask him, since the proposed manufacturers' tax will bring in but $253,000,000, as against the estimated losses, does he concede therefore that it will be impossible materially to reduce the proposed surtaxes on incomes by reason of any revenue accruing from the manufacturers' tax?

Mr. SMOOT. There has been no effort to reduce the amount of tax on incomes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Precisely. I asked the question, Mr. President, because, judging by the telegrams received by Senators, it is still widely believed in the country that the manufacturers' tax, or the sales tax, as it is called, mistakenly, I think, will be productive of a billion dollars a year or thereabouts, and that as the result of its adoption by the Senate and by the other House the surtaxes adopted in the Senate will be wiped out in conference. Other Senators have received telegrams similar to those which I have received, and I think it important that the Senator from Utah should make his opinion pretty clear on that point.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, no man can ever say that I contended that a 1 per cent manufacturers' tax would do what the Senator from Illinois suggests. I have stated previously upon the floor of the Senate and I state again that a 3 per cent manufacturers' tax would probably enable us to do what the Senator from Illinois suggests. That is what the manufacturers of this country were perfectly willing to pay rather than to pay the existing taxes; but when other taxes were retained in the pending bill, then it became possible to reduce the tax under the amendment imposed by me from 3 per cent to 1 per cent.

If the Senator will read my statement to the Senate on October 11 he will find that there I estimated that there would be $759,000,000 raised from the manufacturers' tax at 3 per cent, and one-third of that amount, which is the rate now proposed in my amendment, would, of course, raise $253,000,000.

Mr. President, I do not want this matter to be clouded by a confusion of estimates. In every estimate that I have made, every figure that I have given, I have agreed, outside of the sales tax itself, with Dr. McCoy.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask one question of him?

Mr. McCORMICK. I think I have the floor, but I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator from Utah what his estimate is as to the losses under his amendment as compared with the committee bill as it stands?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the only answer to that is that if the committee bill as it now stands will raise more money, with all of the changes made by my amendment, then the committee bill will raise too much money. There is no question about that at all.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like the Senator's figures as to what the losses will amount to under his amendment as compared with the committee bill as it stands.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not figured them up, for I was interested not so much in what we were going to lose as in what we were going to receive by way of taxes; and all I want to raise is a sufficient amount to pay the running expenses of the Government.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator, then, does not question Mr. McCoy's accuracy in the statement that as compared with the committee bill as it stands his amendment would mean a net loss of $251,000,000?

Mr. SMOOT. I have not gone into details of that estimate, and I am not going to make any statement here until I do. All I say is that I know that this will raise the amount of money estimated by the Treasury Department as required to pay the expenses of the Government, not only for the fiscal year 1922 but for the fiscal year 1923. That I do know.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I think it is important that it should be made perfectly clear, not for the information of the Senate perhaps—because the Senator from Utah has made every effort to clarify the terms of his amendment for the benefit of his colleagues—but for the information of taxpayers, who are telegraphing and writing to Senators, that the proposed Smoot manufacturers' tax would bring in but $250,000,000, and that the Senator himself contemplated no reduction in the surtaxes upon incomes by reason of the adoption of his amendment.

The great majority of the telegrams and letters received during the last few days have been sent, I am very clear, upon the assumption that the manufacturers' tax would bring in so considerable a sum of money that its adoption would lead to a sharp reduction of the surtaxes in the higher brackets.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator was here when I made the statement this morning, he will recall that I simply stated that the Senate had passed upon that question, and they had decided it, and I would take the decision of the Senate upon it, and that is what I have done. I have made the manufacturers' tax, to begin with, to conform to the action of the Senate. It does not mean that it will remain the action of the Senate. Nobody knows what conditions are going to happen in the world or in the United States, and therefore the revenues of the United States may change considerably. In fact, if there is an agreement as to disarmament, the Senator knows that our expenses will be greatly reduced, not by $100,000,000, but by over half a billion dollars a year.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, nobody would gainsay the candor, the amenability, the courtesy, the forbearance of the Senator from Utah. I only reiterate that those who have recently besought Senators to support the manufacturers' tax have done so under a misapprehension, believing that it stood to-day as it did when the Senator made his speech in October. It happens that the columns of the press are crowded with other matters very much less important than the consideration of this bill, and that taxpayers do not know what has been done here or what is proposed to be done.

Not only that, Mr. President, but I believe there is a widespread opinion that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah embodies, not the principle of the manufacturers' tax which he has now submitted before the Senate but the principle of a business sales tax which he has given form in a contemplated amendment.

It is common knowledge that this Congress, before it adjourns next spring or next summer, will pass an adjusted compensation bill. The Senator from North Dakota alluded to that which is equally well known—the purpose of the leaders of the majority at the other end of the Capitol to find the sums necessary to pay that adjusted compensation in a sales tax. Before Senators who have been disposed to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah finally do so, I trust they will consider not only the proposal before the Senate but that prepared as an alternative by the Senator.

The business men have supposed that we were first to consider a tax upon sales, whereas before us we have a proposal to tax manufacturers. Even to-day we are in receipt of telegrams and letters from manufacturers advising us that they had utterly misunderstood the nature of the tax proposed; that in the present state of business, and with a falling market, they can not bear the contemplated tax.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, how could they have borne the 3 per cent tax if they can not bear the 1 per cent tax?

Mr. McCORMICK. I may say that the tax has been bared to them, and therefore they see that they can not bear it.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, well, they knew what the 3 per cent manufacturers' tax was, and we had before us representatives from all over the United States.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, several of them, at least, certainly did not realize that it was a manufacturers' tax that was proposed to be levied.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to say that a meeting was held in my committee room where there were present representatives of manufacturers who employed over 5,000,000 men, and you can not tell me that they did not know what a 3 per cent manufacturers' tax was. They agreed to it unanimously, and I have never heard a word from a manufacturing concern in the United States so far to the effect that they are opposed to this manufacturers' tax. They are perfectly willing to take the load, if it is a fact that it is a load. They realize, of course, the advantage it would be, not only to the consumer but to themselves, to have such a tax that they know what it is and that there is no question as to what their obligations are and they can pay them monthly.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the United States, after all, is a considerable community; and it is not possible that even such a representative gathering as met in the office of the Senator from Utah could speak for all the manufacturers in the country. I allude to those whose messages I have seen or of which I have heard.

If a 1 per cent tax upon manufacturers be established, what will be the tax upon manufacturers when it is necessary to find revenue for the adjusted compensation act? Men whose annual turnover produces a profit of 3 per cent on the turnover—and there are many businesses which produce no more—will see their profit wiped out, or must immediately add the total sum of the tax to the price of their products.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Or else, if the Senator will pardon me, reduce their wages. They must do one of the two.

Mr. McCORMICK. Yes; or reduce the price paid for the wholesale material—live stock, for example.

The plain truth is that the larger as well as the smaller taxpayers who will have to meet this tax, if it be imposed, do not know what is before the Senate and they do not appreciate that it is contemplated to find the revenue to finance the adjusted compensation act in this way. They have believed, many of them, that surtaxes would be sharply reduced by reason of the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah, and we know now that they are mistaken.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Vote!

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate two minutes.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] spoke of my statement here as being a statement formulated and promulgated by myself. As a matter of fact, the statement that I made a little while ago I sent to the clerk in the handwriting of Mr. McCoy. Marked at the top of it is the heading:

Loss of revenue as compared with the Senate bill—Senator SMOOT's manufacturers' tax.

He estimates that the loss for the fiscal year 1923 will be $251,000,000, and for the fiscal year 1922 the same. If the committee feels and the Senate feels that we have a margin of $250,000,000 for 1922 and 1923, of course these figures have no particular significance; but I understood the chairman of the committee to say yesterday that we had a margin as the bill now stands of only $10,000,000. If that be true, then the bill will raise $241,000,000 less than is required.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I just have the figures again from the experts; and the figures that they give me, if the Senator will allow me to put them right in now—they conform to what the Senator has stated—are that the bill as it now stands, as it is amended up to date——

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the basis of Mr. McCoy's figures.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will bring in $3,252,000,000. In round numbers, we will call it $3,250,000,000. By striking out certain parts of it we will lose, under Title IX, $158,870,000; under the stamp taxes, $48,500,000; under Title X, special taxes, $12,000,000; under Title V, telegraphs and telephones, $27,000,000; under the corporation tax, $134,000,000; under beverages, $34,000,000; under admissions and dues, $90,000,000; making in all a loss of $504,000,000.

There will be obtained under the amendment as it is now drawn, according to their estimates, and I believe according to the claim of the Senator from Utah, $253,000,000. That would leave a loss of $251,000,000; and deducting this $251,000,000 from $3,250,000,000—or call them both $250,000,000—would leave $3,000,000,000, or $250,000,000 less than the bill as it now stands. In other words, there would be a deficit of something over $250,000,000 in the amount necessary for the ensuing year.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. I have the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator yield for just a minute?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, that is for the fiscal year 1923, and the Treasury Department says that we do not want $4,000,000,000 for 1923; we want three billion four hundred and some odd million dollars. My amendment, therefore, provides just enough money for that fiscal year, and that is why the difference occurs in these figures. I am not trying to raise under the bill any more than $3,400,000,000 for the fiscal year 1923. The figures quoted by the Senator were for the fiscal year 1923, and what he says there is true; but I do not want that much money; we do not need it for 1923.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have understood the Senator to contend up to this time that the bill would not raise nearly as much money as we would need and that there would be a deficit.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator has not heard me make such a statement or intimate it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think Senators on the committee will verify my statement that the Senator repeatedly said in the committee that we would not collect enough money under this bill. But I withdraw the statement if the Senator says I am mistaken about it.

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure the Senator is mistaken, because I never said that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw it. I want to say just one thing more: The Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK] is entirely correct when he says that telegrams are coming from manufacturers stating that they do not understand the amendment. I am absolutely certain that the impression has existed that this amendment would raise sufficient revenue to justify not only a reduction in the corporation income tax, but a large reduction in the surtaxes as now fixed in the bill. In fact, I think nine-tenths of the manufacturers of the country who have been in favor of this sales tax have been in favor of it because they thought that the large sum of money which would be raised by it would be sufficient to justify a reduction in the corporation taxes, and also justify cutting down the surtaxes probably to 25 or 30 per cent.

Senators who are members of the committee will remember that when we were having the hearings scores of witnesses came before us advocating the sales tax, and practically every one of them said that at the same time he was advocating it he was advocating a radical reduction in the surtaxes and the elimination of the excess-profits taxes. I am satisfied that if they could understand the situation, and could be convinced of the fact that the adoption of this amendment would not permit any further reduction in the surtaxes, and would not permit a reduction of 5 per cent in the corporation income taxes, they would not favor it. I think their belief that those taxes would be reduced is the ground upon which they favor it.

Mr. President, the amendment as now proposed will not only not allow any further reduction in the surtaxes or in the corporate income taxes, but if it is adopted it will become necessary either to increase the surtax of 50 per cent and the corporate income tax of 15 per cent above the rates provided in the bill as amended up to this time, or we shall have to go out and find additional sources of taxation on which to raise the $250,000,000 we would lose by the adoption of the Senator's amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I was requested to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on official business. He is paired with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. If present, the Senator from Massachusetts would vote "yea," and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] would vote "nay."

Mr. McLEAN (when his name was called). On this amendment I am paired with the junior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS. I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON]. The Senator from Texas would vote "nay" if he were present, and I would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] is necessarily absent. He is paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If the Senator from Mississippi were present and permitted to vote, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HALE. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS], and being unable to obtain a transfer I am not at liberty to vote. If permitted to vote I would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. On this vote the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW]. If the Senator from Iowa were present and not paired he would vote "yea" and the Senator from Pennsylvania would vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT. I offer the following amendment, which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if we can not allow this amendment to be the pending amendment to be taken up when the bill is taken up to-morrow. It is not going to lead to very much discussion. I would very much prefer to have that course pursued.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, it would be very gratifying to me and I think to most of the committee if the amendment could be voted on to-night, but in deference to the request of the Senator from Utah I have no alternative, as I see it, but to agree to have the amendment go over. I sincerely hope his prediction will turn out to be correct, that it will not lead to any extended debate.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that this is what may be designated as the turnover tax of one-half of 1 per cent upon all sales. It will raise more money than the manufacturers' tax. Many Members of the Senate feel that they would like to vote for it, and I feel that way myself.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator does not think it will lead to any prolonged debate?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not. I will assure the Senator that so far as I am concerned I can state what I have to say in five minutes.

Mr. PENROSE. Then let it go over.

Mr. REED. I do not know who has the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. I have the floor. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me make the statement, as coming from our side, that the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], in charge of the bill, has from the first made every effort to get the bill pushed forward as rapidly as possible. I think the Senator has been diligent; I think if the Senator consents to the Senate adjourning now, everybody will understand that he has not done anything tending toward delay. The Senate has proceeded almost to the point of exhaustion, and the Senator from Pennsylvania has been as industrious in pushing the matter as any man could be. It is a great question and requires reasonable consideration. If I have any complaint at all to make about the Senator from Pennsylvania it is that he has been inclined to drive us a little too hard.

I think if we adjourn until to-morrow and then take up this matter and let the Senator from Utah present his views we will have reached a point where we can get rid of the bill pretty soon. All the fundamental questions have been discussed.

I only take the time of the Senate now for the purpose of saying what I have said because it seemed to me that the Senator from Pennsylvania might be a little oversensitive about the matter. I am willing to certify to the country that he has pushed the bill with all the force that was justifiable. I think we should adjourn to-night and resume the consideration of the bill to-morrow after a good night's rest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be received, printed, and lie on the table.

INTERSTATE HIGHWAY SYSTEM—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, before the Senate adjourns I would like to call up the conference report on the good roads bill. I understand there will be no discussion upon it, and I would like to have it disposed of if it can be done in that way. I ask unanimous consent to present the conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the presentation of the conference report?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I feel like apologizing for delaying the Senate even two minutes at this hour, yet this conference report on the good roads bill is an enormously important matter——

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona permit me? It is quite obvious that it will lead to discussion, so I object to the consideration of the report.

Mr. ASHURST. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. PENROSE. To what is the Senator speaking?

Mr. ASHURST. On the request of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. PENROSE. I have objected to its consideration, and it has disappeared.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I am going to be recognized in my own right for two minutes because this is an important matter. I have had a dozen telegrams and a hundred letters within two weeks—but I am not going to encumber the RECORD with them—asking if in the bill there is an appropriation for the construction of roads on Indian reservations. Senators must not be impatient when I lay such inquiries before the Senate then.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, let me make this statement.

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The Senate and the House have been working upon the bill in conference. The House has accepted the conference report and sent it to the Senate. There is no change that could now be made in the conference report. It must either be voted up or voted down. We have practically agreed to the bill as it passed the Senate. Very few changes were made by the conference committee, and no change but what I think will be adopted without debate.

The Senator, of course, could hold it up and make a speech in reference to the Indian reservations. They are not included in the bill, and never have been included in any good roads bill. Neither House had any provision for them; the conference therefore could not write it in.

The question with me was, and I suppose it was the desire of everybody, to get the bill enacted into law. There is no objection to it, I think. I believe it will meet fairly well the views of all the Senators and Members of the House.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. CARAWAY. I do not intend to occupy more than half a minute. I understand there is to follow legislation correcting one section in the bill. Otherwise I think the bill would not be very acceptable to the people in my State, but with the assurance I have that such legislation is coming after, I have no dispostion to object to the conference report.

Mr. ASHURST. I apologize for my short side remark a moment ago to the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], but I hope Senators will not be impatient.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator that my purpose in speaking to him a moment ago was to explain just exactly what the chairman of the committee has so well explained, that there was no possible chance for anything to be done at this time in the matter which he has at heart. The matter did not come before our committee at all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the conference may be laid before the Senate and voted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference, and it was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 1072) entitled "An act to amend the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House of Representatives, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by said amendment insert the following:

"That this act may be cited as the Federal highway act.

"SEC. 2. That, when used in this act, unless the context indicates otherwise—

"The term 'Federal aid act' means the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916, as amended by sections 5 and 6 of an act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes,' approved February 28, 1919, and all other acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto.

"The term 'highway' includes rights of way, bridges, drainage structures, signs, guardrails, and protective structures in connection with highways, but shall not include any highway or street in a municipality having a population of 2,500 or more as shown by the last available census, except that portion of any such highway or street along which within a distance of 1 mile the houses average more than 200 feet apart.

"The term 'State highway department' includes any State department, commission, board, or official having adequate powers and suitably equipped and organized to discharge to the satisfaction of the Secretary of Agriculture the duties herein required.

"The term 'maintenance' means the constant making of needed repairs to preserve a smooth-surfaced highway.

"The term 'construction' means the supervising, inspecting, actual building, and all expenses incidental to the construction of a highway, except locating, surveying, mapping, and costs of right of way.

"The term 'reconstruction' means a widening or a rebuilding of the highway or any portion thereof to make it a continuous road, and of sufficient width and strength to care adequately for traffic needs.

"The term 'forest roads' means roads wholly or partly within or adjacent to and serving the national forests.

"The term 'State funds' includes for the purposes of this act funds raised under the authority of the State, or any political or other subdivisions thereof, and made available for expenditure under the direct control of the State highway department.

"SEC. 3. All powers and duties of the Council of National Defense under the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1917, and for other purposes,' approved August 29, 1916, in relation to highway or highway transport, are hereby transferred to the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Council of National Defense is directed to turn over to the Secretary of Agriculture the equipment, material, supplies, papers, maps, and documents utilized in the exercise of such powers. The powers and duties of agencies dealing with highways in the national parks or in military or naval reservations under the control of the United States Army or Navy, or with highways used principally for military or naval purposes, shall not be taken over by the Secretary of Agriculture, but such highways shall remain under the control and jurisdiction of such agencies.

"The Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to cooperate with the State highway departments, and with the Department of the Interior in the construction of public highways within Indian reservations, and to pay the amount assumed therefor from the funds allotted or apportioned under this act to the State wherein the reservation is located.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall establish an accounting division which shall devise and install a proper method of keeping the accounts.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to transfer to the Secretary of Agriculture, upon his request, all war material, equipment, and supplies now or hereafter declared surplus from stock now on hand and not needed for the purposes of the War Department but suitable for use in the improvement of highways, and that the same shall be distributed among the highway departments of the several States to be used in the construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of highways, such distribution to be upon the same basis as that hereinafter provided for in this act in the distribution of Federal-aid fund: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture, in his discretion, may reserve from such distribution not to exceed 10 per cent of such material, equipment, and supplies for use in the construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of national forest roads or other roads constructed, reconstructed, or maintained under his direct supervision.

"SEC. 6. That in approving projects to receive Federal aid under the provisions of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall give preference to such projects as will expedite the completion of an adequate and connected system of highways, interstate in character.

"Before any projects are approved in any State, such State, through its State highway department, shall select or designate a system of highways not to exceed 7 per cent of the total highway mileage of such State as shown by the records of the State highway department at the time of the passage of this act.

"Upon this system all Federal-aid apportionments shall be expended.

"Highways which may receive Federal aid shall be divided into two classes, one of which shall be known as primary or interstate highways, and shall not exceed three-sevenths of the total mileage which may receive Federal aid, and the other which shall connect or correlate therewith and be known as secondary or intercounty highways, and shall consist of the remainder of the mileage which may receive Federal aid.

"The Secretary of Agriculture shall have authority to approve in whole or in part the systems as designated or to require modifications or revisions thereof: Provided, That the State shall submit to the Secretary of Agriculture for his approval any proposed revisions of the designated systems of highways above provided for.

"Not more than 60 per cent of all Federal aid allotted to any State shall be expended upon the primary or interstate highways until provision has been made for the improvement of the entire system of such highways: Provided, That with the approval of any State highway department the Secretary of Agriculture may approve the expenditure of more than 60 per cent of the Federal aid apportioned to such State upon the primary or interstate highways in such State.

"The Secretary of Agriculture may approve projects submitted by the State highway departments prior to the selection, designation, and approval of the system of Federal-aid highways herein provided for if he may reasonably anticipate that such projects will become a part of such system.

"Whenever provision has been made by any State for the completion and maintenance of a system of primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty highways equal to 7 per cent of the total mileage of such State, as required by this act, said State, through its State highway department, by and with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, is hereby authorized to add to the mileage of primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty systems as funds become available for the construction and maintenance of such additional mileage.

"SEC. 7. That before any project shall be approved by the Secretary of Agriculture for any State such State shall make provisions for State funds required each year of such States by this act for construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of all Federal-aid highways within the State, which funds shall be under the direct control of the State highway department.

"SEC. 8. That only such durable types of surface and kinds of materials shall be adopted for the construction and reconstruction of any highway which is a part of the primary or interstate and secondary or intercounty systems as will adequately meet the existing and probable traffic future needs and conditions thereon. The Secretary of Agriculture shall approve the types and width of construction and reconstruction and the character of improvement, repair, and maintenance in each case, consideration being given to the type and character which shall be best suited for each locality and to the probable character and extent of the future traffic.

"SEC. 9. That all highways constructed or reconstructed under the provisions of this act shall be free from tolls of all kinds.

"That all highways in the primary or interstate system constructed after the passage of this act shall have a right of way of ample width and a wearing surface of an adequate width which shall not be less than 18 feet, unless, in the opinion of the Secretary of Agriculture, it is rendered impracticable by physical conditions, excessive costs, probable traffic requirements, or legal obstacles.

"SEC. 10. That when any State shall have met the requirements of this act, the Secretary of the Treasury, upon receipt of certification from the governor of such State to such effect, approved by the Secretary of Agriculture, shall immediately make available to such State, for the purpose set forth in this act, the sum apportioned to such State as herein provided.

"SEC. 11. That any State having complied with the provisions of this act, and desiring to avail itself of the benefits thereof, shall by its State highway department submit to the Secretary of Agriculture project statements setting forth proposed construction or reconstruction of any primary or interstate, or secondary or intercounty highway therein. If the Secretary of Agriculture approve the project, the State highway department shall furnish to him such surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates therefor as he may require; items included for engineering, inspection, and unforeseen contingencies shall not exceed 10 per cent of the total estimated cost of its construction. That when the Secretary of Agriculture approves such surveys, plans, specifications, and estimates, he shall notify the State highway department and immediately certify the fact to the Secretary of the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon set aside the share of the United States payable under this act on account of such projects, which shall not exceed 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof, except that in the case of any State containing unappropriated public lands exceeding 5 per cent of the total area of all lands in the State, the share of the United States payable under this act on account of such projects shall not exceed 50 per cent of the total estimated cost thereof plus a percentage of such estimated cost equal to one-half of the percentage which the area of the unappropriated public lands in such State bears to the total area of such State: Provided, That the limitation of payments not to exceed $20,000 per mile, under existing law, which the Secretary of Agriculture may make be, and the same is hereby, increased in proportion to the increased percentage of Federal aid authorized by this section: Provided further, That these provisions relative to the public-land States shall apply to all unobligated or unmatched funds appropriated by the Federal aid act and payment for approved projects upon which actual building construction work had not begun on the 30th day of June, 1921.

"SEC. 12. That the construction and reconstruction of the highways or parts of highways under the provisions of this act, and all contracts, plans, specifications, and estimates relating thereto, shall be undertaken by the State highway departments subject to the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture. The construction and reconstruction work and labor in each State shall be done in accordance with its laws and under the direct supervision of the State highway department, subject to the inspection and approval of the Secretary of Agriculture and in accordance with the rules and regulations pursuant to this act.

"SEC. 13. That when the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that any project approved by him has been constructed or reconstructed in compliance with said plans and specifications, he shall cause to be paid to the proper authorities of said State the amount set aside for said project.

"That the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, from time to time, make payments on such construction or reconstruction as the work progresses, but these payments, including previous payments, if any, shall not be more than the United States' pro rata of the value of the labor and materials which have been actually put into such construction or reconstruction in conformity to said plans and specifications. The Secretary of Agriculture and the State highway department of each State may jointly determine at what time and in what amounts payments as work progresses shall be made under this act.

"Such payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, on warrants drawn by the Secretary of Agriculture, to such official or officials or depository as may be designated by the State highway department and authorized under the laws of the State to receive public funds of the State.

"SEC. 14. That should any State fail to maintain any highway within its boundaries after construction or reconstruction under the provisions of this act, the Secretary of Agriculture shall then serve notice upon the State highway department of that fact, and if within 90 days after receipt of such notice said highway has not been placed in proper condition of maintenance, the Secretary of Agriculture shall proceed immediately to have such highway placed in a proper condition of maintenance and charge the cost thereof against the Federal funds allotted to such State, and shall refuse to approve any other project in such State, except as hereinafter provided.

"Upon the reimbursement by the State of the amount expended by the Federal Government for such maintenance, said amount shall be paid into the Federal highway fund for reapportionment among all the States for the construction of roads under this act, and the Secretary of Agriculture shall then approve further projects submitted by the State as in this act provided.

"Whenever it shall become necessary for the Secretary of Agriculture under the provisions of this act to place any highway in a proper condition of maintenance the Secretary of Agriculture shall contract with some responsible party or parties for doing such work: Provided, however, That in case he is not able to secure a satisfactory contract he may purchase, lease, hire, or otherwise obtain all necessary supplies, equipment, and labor, and may operate and maintain such motor and other equipment and facilities as in his judgment are necessary for the proper and efficient performance of his functions.

"SEC. 15. That within two years after this act takes effect the Secretary of Agriculture shall prepare, publish, and distribute a map showing the highways and forest roads that have been selected and approved as a part of the primary or interstate and the secondary or intercounty systems, and at least annually thereafter shall publish supplementary maps showing his program and the progress made in selection, construction, and reconstruction.

"SEC. 16. That for the purpose of this act the consent of the United States is hereby given to any railroad or canal company to convey to the highway department of any State any part of its right of way or other property in that State acquired by grant from the United States.

"SEC. 17. That if the Secretary of Agriculture determines that any part of the public lands or reservations of the United States is reasonably necessary for the right of way of any highway or forest road or as a source of materials for the construction or maintenance of any such highway or forest road adjacent to such lands or reservations, the Secretary of Agriculture shall file with the Secretary of the department supervising the administration of such land or reservation a map showing the portion of such lands or reservations which it is desired to appropriate.

"If within a period of four months after such filing the said Secretary shall not have certified to the Secretary of Agriculture that the proposed appropriation of such land or material is contrary to the public interest or inconsistent with the purposes for which such land or materials have been reserved, or shall have agreed to the appropriation and transfer under conditions which he deems necessary for the adequate protection and utilization of the reserve, then such land and materials may be appropriated and transferred to the State highway department for such purposes and subject to the conditions so specified.

"If at any time the need for such lands or materials for such purposes shall no longer exist, notice of the fact shall be given by the State highway department to the Secretary of Agriculture, and such lands or materials shall immediately revert to the control of the Secretary of the department from which they had been appropriated.

"SEC. 18. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall prescribe and promulgate all needful rules and regulations for the carrying out of the provisions of this act, including such recommendations to the Congress and the State highway departments as he may deem necessary for preserving and protecting the highways and insuring the safety of traffic thereon.

"SEC. 19. That on and before the first Monday in December of each year the Secretary of Agriculture shall make a report to Congress, which shall include a detailed statement of the work done, the status of each project undertaken, the allocation of appropriations, an itemized statement of the expenditures and receipts during the preceding fiscal year under this act, an itemized statement of the traveling and other expenses, including a list of employees, their duties, salaries, and traveling expenses, if any, and his recommendations, if any, for new legislation amending or supplementing this act. The Secretary of Agriculture shall also make such special reports as Congress may request.

"SEC. 20. That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, $75,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, $25,000,000 of which shall become immediately available, and $50,000,000 of which shall become available January 1, 1922.

"SEC. 21. That so much, not to exceed 2½ per cent, of all moneys hereby or hereafter appropriated for expenditure under the provisions of this act, as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary for administering the provisions of this act and for carrying on necessary highway research and investigational studies independently or in cooperation with the State highway departments and other research agencies, and for publishing the results thereof, shall be deducted for such purposes, available until expended.

"Within 60 days after the close of each fiscal year the Secretary of Agriculture shall determine what part, if any, of the sums theretofore deducted for such purposes will not be needed and apportion such part, if any, for the fiscal year then current in the same manner and on the same basis as are other amounts authorized by this act apportioned among all the States, and shall certify such apportionment to the Secretary of the Treasury and to the State highway departments.

"The Secretary of Agriculture, after making the deduction authorized by this section, shall apportion the remainder of the appropriation made for expenditure under the provision of the act for the fiscal year among the several States in the following manner: One-third in the ratio which the area of each State bears to the total area of all the States; one-third in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the total population of all the States, as shown by the latest available Federal census; one-third in the ratio which the mileage of rural delivery routes and star routes in each State bears to the total mileage of rural delivery and star routes in all the States at the close of the next preceding fiscal year, as shown by certificate of the Postmaster General, which he is directed to make and furnish annually to the Secretary of Agriculture: Provided, That no State shall receive less than one-half of 1 per cent of each year's allotment. All moneys herein or hereafter appropriated for expenditure under the provisions of this act shall be available until the close of the second succeeding fiscal year for which apportionment was made: Provided further, That any sums apportioned to any State under the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916, and all acts amendatory thereof and supplemental thereto, shall be available for expenditure in that State for the purpose set forth in such acts until two years after the close of the respective fiscal years for which any such sums become available, and any amount so apportioned remaining unexpended at the end of the period during which it is available for expenditure under the terms of such acts shall be reapportioned according to the provisions of the act entitled 'An act to provide that the United Staes shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes,' approved July 11, 1916: And provided further, That any amount apportioned under the provisions of this act unexpended at the end of the period during which it is available for expenditure under the terms of this section shall be reapportioned within 60 days thereafter to all the States in the same manner and on the same basis, and certified to the Secretary of the Treasury and the State highway departments in the same way as if it were being apportioned under this act for the first time.

"SEC. 22. That within 60 days after the approval of this act the Secretary of Agriculture shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and to each of the State highway departments the sum he has estimated to be deducted for administering the provisions of this act and the sums which he has apportioned to each State for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, and on or before January 20 next preceding the commencement of each succeeding fiscal year, and shall make like certificates for each fiscal year.

"SEC. 23. That out of the moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, there is hereby appropriated for the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of forest roads and trails, the sum of $5,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922, available immediately and until expended, and $10,000,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1923, available until expended.

"(a) Fifty per cent, but not to exceed $3,000,000 for any one fiscal year, of the appropriation made or that may hereafter be made for expenditure under the provisions of this section shall be expended under the direct supervision of the Secretary of Agriculture in the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of roads and trails of primary importance for the protection, administration, and utilization of the national forests, or when necessary, for the use and development of resources upon which communities within or adjacent to the national forests are dependent, and shall be apportioned among the several States, Alaska, and Porto Rico by the Secretary of Agriculture, according to the relative needs of the various national forests, taking into consideration the existing transportation facilities, value of timber, or other resources served, relative fire danger, and comparative difficulties of road and trail construction.

"The balance of such appropriations shall be expended by the Secretary of Agriculture in the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of forest roads of primary importance to the State, counties, or communities within, adjoining, or adjacent to the national forests, and shall be prorated and apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture for expenditures in the several States, Alaska, and Porto Rico, according to the area and value of the land owned by the Government within the national forests therein as determined by the Secretary of Agriculture from such information, investigation, sources, and departments as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem most accurate.

"(b) Cooperation of Territories, States, and civil subdivisions thereof may be accepted but shall not be required by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"(c) The Secretary of Agriculture may enter into contracts with any Territory, State, or civil subdivision thereof, for the construction, reconstruction, or maintenance of any forest road or trail or part thereof.

"(d) Construction work on forest roads or trails estimated to cost $5,000 or more per mile, exclusive of bridges, shall be advertised and let to contract.

"If such estimated cost is less than $5,000 per mile, or if after proper advertising no acceptable bid is received, or the bids are deemed excessive, the work may be done by the Secretary of Agriculture on his own account; and for such purpose the Secretary of Agriculture may purchase, lease, hire, rent, or otherwise obtain all necessary supplies, materials, tools, equipment, and facilities required to perform the work.

"The appropriation made in this section or that may hereafter be made for expenditure under the provisions of this section may be expended for the purpose herein authorized and for the payment of wages, salaries, and other expenses for help employed in connection with such work.

"SEC. 24. That in any State where the existing constitution or laws will not permit the State to provide revenues for the construction, reconstruction, or maintenance of highways, the Secretary of Agriculture shall continue to approve projects for said State until three years after the passage of this act, if he shall find that said State has complied with the provisions of this act in so far as its existing constitution and laws will permit.

"SEC. 25. That if any provision of this act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstances, shall be held invalid, the validity of the remainder of the act and of the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances shall not be affected thereby.

"SEC. 26. That all acts or parts of acts in any way inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed, and this act shall take effect on its passage."

And the Senate agree to the same.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, this is practically the bill as it passed the Senate, with two or three verbal changes made as we went through the bill. I ask the Secretary to read the statement which I submitted with it. It will tell exactly what has been done.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

STATEMENT ON THE PART OF THE SENATE CONFEREES.

The only important departures from the original Senate amendment agreed upon in conference are as follows:

1. In section 2 the size of municipalities through which Federal highway fund can be used for the construction of roads is a reduction from 5,000 inhabitants to 2,500; the latter figure is a provision in the present law.

Also in section 2 there is a change in the definition of "construction," which excludes locating, surveying, mapping, and costs of rights of way from any participation in Federal-aid funds.

To the Senate amendment definition of "State funds" is added "and made available for expenditure under the direct control of the State highway department."

2. Under section 7 of the amendment agreed to in conference it is provided that funds for construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of all Federal-aid highways within the State shall be under the direct control of the State highway department.

3. Under section 11 the conferees agree to the increase of the limit of $20,000 per mile under changed law as to the public-land States in proportion to the Federal-aid increase in such States.

4. In section 14 the conferees have agreed that the Senate amendment relative to the disposition of funds paid by the States in case of default in the maintenance of roads shall be apportioned according to the original House amendment.

5. Other changes in the Senate amendment as adopted August 19, 1921, are made merely for the purposes of clarity and to avoid the possibility of misconstruction of the act in its administration. The conference report as presented is practically in accordance with the provisions of the Senate amendment passed August 19, 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I move that the Senate adjourn until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 7 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, November 4, 1921, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, November 3, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, vouchsafe unto us the blessing of Thy guidance that our daily walk may be acceptable unto Thee. Give, O give us the repose of mind that believes that all things work together for good to them that love Thee and keep Thy commandments. Provide a way of happiness and peace for the discouraged, the wounded, and the sick. Bless us with hunger for righteousness, wisdom, and all those other virtues that lift us to the highest service for our country. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FLORAL WREATH FOR THE UNKNOWN SOLDIER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate concurrent resolution No. 14 and consider the same.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate concurrent resolution No. 14, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 14.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to purchase a floral wreath to be placed upon the caisson bearing the remains of the unknown soldier which are to lie in state in the Rotunda of the Capitol of the United States from November 9 to November 11, 1921, the expense of same to be paid in equal proportions from the contingent funds of the Senate and House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES ON COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8842) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] will please take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8842, with Mr. STAFFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8842, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8842) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. On the general debate the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] has 32½ minutes remaining and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] has 11½ minutes remaining.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am a little in doubt, after the discussion of yesterday with reference to the great advantage to be derived from the completion of this Alaskan railway by reason of the presence in that Territory of unknown quantities of national resources—coal and iron and gold and various other metals and minerals—whether we ought to throw open for promiscuous entry for agricultural purposes—and that is what this bill does, notwithstanding some of the provisions in the nature of restrictions and conditions—all this vast Territory. There are 55,036 people up there, according to the 1920 census, and it is claimed that it is going to be of great advantage to the rest of the United States to permit them to enter upon these lands for agricultural purposes. I doubt the wisdom of opening up that entire Territory, because of the desire of the people down in the vicinity of Cook Inlet to get agricultural entries, to homestead settlers under the requirements of this law and the general homestead law. It seems to me, if we are going to enter upon the development of the Territory of Alaska, that we should establish some policy under which its other resources can be mined or taken advantage of and developed, so that not only the few people who are inhabiting that Territory should be benefited but that the entire country should receive the benefit.

Alaska is rather a costly proposition, notwithstanding the great wealth that it contains by reason of these deposits of coal and gold and other minerals and metals. It is a very expensive Territory to maintain, and now we come in and say that we are going to open up coal lands for agricultural development, but will reserve the coal that is there, provided the farmer can mine it for domestic use.

It might be that in mining it for domestic use the farmer would practically destroy its possibilities for mining for industrial purposes. It might also be that in attempting to mine it for domestic use he would discover other metals or minerals in there, the rights to which, as I read this measure, are not reserved. It might be that in developing the acres which would come to him under his patent for agricultural purposes he would destroy future possibilities for water power, and under the reservations of this bill as I read them there is no safeguard thrown around those possibilities.

It seems to me if we are going to pass a general bill for the benefit of a few settlers and would-be settlers at Cook's Inlet it would be better to describe the tracts or areas up there or provide for a survey where these desirable agricultural sections are and to permit them to be developed for agricultural purposes and have some plan or policy. As I understand it, under this bill discretion is left to somebody here in the department to permit agricultural entries here and there throughout the Territory. As I understand, there are many chances of developing water power in Alaska, and many minerals or metals may yet be discovered there in vast quantities, traces of which have already been found. It seems to me we ought not to adopt a policy which is going to be in conflict with that which we have heretofore followed in that Territory.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. WILLIAMSON].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question with reference to the first section of this bill, where it is provided that—and any settler who has prior to the passage of this act initiated a homestead claim in good faith on lands containing workable deposits of coal, oil, gas, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein and not otherwise reserved or withdrawn, may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which the claim was initiated, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act: Provided, however, That should it be discovered at any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

The point I want to get at is whether, as to those patents which may issue upon lands already homesteaded, there will be a reservation that will protect the coal, oil, and other minerals so that prospectors may go upon land so patented and utilize it for the purpose of mining?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; there will be a reservation.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. That is, in the "limited patent" referred to in this bill there is such a limitation?

Mr. SINNOTT. The reservation is in the patent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Dakota has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have no time to yield.

Mr. RAKER. I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I want to tell you and the Members of the House a story. I hope its tragic features will not escape you. I hope that the President of this country and every Member of Congress and the Public Health Service officials will read it.

About two years ago a man named William Centlivre walked into the office of the Surgeon General and startled those that were present by a declaration containing four short words, "I am a leper." The newspapers of this city informed the people how quickly Centlivre found himself alone—for a while at least. That night he occupied a building on the outskirts of the city some distance from the old city jail. He was monarch of all he surveyed. There was none to dispute his possession of the house in which he found himself. From there he gave out a statement to the reporters who from a distance interviewed him. That statement was a new story. It was published and commented upon in some form or another from ocean to ocean. Centlivre said that he was the avant courier of 500 lepers who were coming from all parts of the country to Washington, and that it was their purpose to march up Pennsylvania Avenue to the White House and petition the President of the United States of America for the relief which they thought should have been given them. He also gave out a statement with reference to the manner in which he had been treated while he had been a soldier in our World War army, which caused an investigation to be made by the then Secretary of War.

The commission which was appointed to look into the charges of this unfortunate victim of nature and chance found them to be substantially true. But that is another story, and some day I am going to relate that chapter of a leper's history to this House, "lest we forget" the miseries suffered and endured by obscure and unknown lads while in the service of their country and in order that Congress might understand the complexities that sometimes confront a poor devil in securing justice from the upper ten of the military service.

"God moves in mysterious ways His wonders to perform," and every day one may see what insignificant factors are selected by Him to carry out His will. For years the National Government had been urged to establish a national leprosarium where the shunned of mankind might find, if not nepenthe, a sanctuary and asylum, and be freed from the abhorrence of those who fled in terror at the mere suggestion that a leper was near. For, my friends, the fear of this awful malady has been with men and women from almost the twilight of history. It was known as the scourge and curse of the human race 1,500 years before Christ, in India; and in the Orient and Palestine, and the countries immediately east of it, leprosy existed in almost pestilential degree until the first century of the Christian era. As the power of the Roman Empire declined in the west of Europe a strong tide of immigration from the Levant set in and leprosy spread until no country in Europe was free from it, and the returning Crusaders spread and aggravated the disease in the eleventh and twelfth centuries. Between the sixth and the fifteenth centuries leprosy was by far the most dangerous and dreaded disease of which any account has come down to us through history or tradition. For the leper there was no hope at all on this earth. The convicted felon undergoing a life sentence stood a chance of securing a pardon and the condemned man might not give up hope altogether even while standing on the scaffold; but for the "accursed of mankind" there was nothing but the grave. All of the large cities and towns had a place especially set apart for lepers. This reservation was shunned as if it were the mouth of a burning hell filled with the shrieking souls of the damned and lost. A line was drawn beyond which no leper could cross except at the risk of being immediately stoned to death. If a healthy stranger unwittingly wandered too near the leper's camp he was remorselessly thrust into it and made to share the lot of those previously afflicted. Food was furnished to these leper camps by the town authorities. It was deposited about midway in a sort of No Man's Land, and after the carriers had withdrawn for some time the lepers could crawl from their kennels, secure the food, and then crawl back whence they came. Sometimes the provisions were left on an exposed hill selected for the purpose in the daytime and the inmates of the camps came forth at night and removed it.

It was woe to the afflicted, for no social status, no official position, however exalted, no religious attachment, however sacred, served to keep the leprosy sufferer from universal ostracism. Solitary lepers abounded in the sparsely settled districts of the country, and each one wandered about by himself in the infrequented woods and uninhabited waste places. He had to wrap himself in a sheet so that only his eyes were exposed, and by night and by day travel his lonely way in places so lonely that God Himself seemed not to be there. The ringing of the bell which he carried in his hand to warn any wayfarer of his approach was hardly necessary, for he was far, far from the maddening crowd's ignoble strife. But the dismal tinkling of the leper's bell was heard occasionally, and then men, women, and children fled in terror indescribable until physical exhaustion precluded their going farther. An effort was made to alleviate the sufferings of these afflicted nomads at an early period in the history of the Christian Church. The Order of St. Lazarus, taking its name from Lazarus, the beggar who ate the crumbs that fell from the rich man's table, was founded as early as 72 A. D. More than a thousand years after, the military order of Lazarus was founded by the Knights Hospitalers. Numerous lazarettos were established in the principal cities of Europe by these knights after they were driven out of Palestine. The leper was treated as one dead from the civil-law standpoint. His property passed to his heirs. His wife was free to marry again, and on his departure for the lazaretto prayers for the dead were repeated over him and a shovelful of earth was thrown after him to make the ceremony complete.

Let us see the difference in their treatment in the barbarous past and the civilized and enlightened now. The most widely known settlement for lepers to-day is on the island of Molokai in Hawaii. There is one in the United States of America. It is situated or located in a place called Carville, La. It is a national leprosarium in name. I say in name advisedly, for it does not function as a national institution should. For years and years medical authorities of the various States and the Surgeons General of the Public Health Service have urged the establishment of a national leper home under the United States Public Health Service for the care and treatment of those who are doomed to pass the remainder of their life as outcasts, dead to the world but still in its midst. Poor unfortunate, wretched, obscure, and lonely Centlivre, you have done more for the afflicted than all of the medical authorities in this country had done up to your time, for by your story you have aroused the national conscience and forced the action which resulted in the taking over by the United States Government of the Carville Institution, which had been operated and conducted by the State of Louisiana.

Of course, there were no rivalries on the part of cities or States to secure this institution. Of course, there were no petitions from chambers of commerce and boards of trade or exchanges and marts for the privilege of succoring and aiding the most desolate human beings on earth or giving shelter and sanctuary to those who after incarceration once must give up all hope of ever looking again upon mother, brother, or sister, and forever afterwards eat their bread in tears and loneliness and sorrow. But poor Centlivre could only begin a work which in its present state is no credit to the United States of America. His voice is now still, for he is immured within the walls of Carville and he can not by his reproaches to his American countrymen secure their attention to the needs of himself and his fellows, as well as to the anguished and tortured souls who are all over this country in hospitals and in other establishments, segregated, it is true, from other patients, but where they are nevertheless a menace to the American people. Centlivre said that there were 500 men who would soon be on their way to Washington. Willard Centlivre knows almost as much about leprosy as the doctors who treat it, and apparently more about lepers, the number of them, who they are, and where they are located than any person who is not within "the inner circle" of that hapless fraternity, of which he is a prominent member. From what he told me, because I, too, interviewed him, the lepers that are abroad among us, and who are unsuspected by the people, generally know each other, and their fear of exposure has driven them into a brotherhood whose bonds are sympathy for each other and the terror of being exposed to the horror and dread that is as great on the part of humanity to-day as it was in the long-ago centuries that have fled into eternity, when the white spot on the forehead at once caused the shout, "To the desert with the leper."

Mr. Speaker, I trust my story up till this time, however doleful, has been somewhat interesting, if not entertaining. I have no great delight in it myself, though I believe I am, like most people, sympathetically disposed to the afflicted. I would rather a thousand times talk to you about the great and brave spirits of high and low degree that followed Andrew Jackson on the fields of Chalmette and there won for themselves imperishable fame and glory when they mowed down the veterans of the peninsular wars under the command of Packenham, the brother-in-law of the Iron Duke Wellington; of great and splendid John McDonogh, whose name is written over 31 schoolhouses in New Orleans and is inscribed in the hearts of the school boys and girls of New Orleans; of old Push-ma-ta-ha, the celebrated Indian chieftain and rival of the great Tecumseh; and of Lafitte and Dominick You and the Corsairs and pirates of the Spanish Main, all of whom fought by the side of the well-beloved philanthropist and mingled their shouts with his on the streets of New Orleans in the great joy of the victory that had been won by the prowess and dauntless courage of the great Americans that are no more.

But I told you in the beginning of my story of the lepers that it had a tragic chapter. Now to that chapter.

The housing facilities at our national leprosarium are so miserably inadequate that more than 150 lepers are held all over this country and can not be sent to this institution. One hundred and fifty men and women all in different hospitals and other establishments throughout the United States, where they are a menace to their fellows, however segregated they may be, and all because the United States Government has been so frugal, so economical, so cheap and parsimonious, niggardly, and miserly that it has not made the appropriations to build the houses necessary to accommodate those that are, after all, however penalized by nature, of our blood, our kith, and our kin may be, who are American men and women and whose path we have at least once crossed. Let me read you a letter which, in cold official phraseology, sets forth this disgraceful and damnable condition more eloquently than the words of any poet or editor could blazon them to the world:

OCTOBER 20, 1921.

Hon. JAMES O'CONNOR,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Receipt is acknowledged of your communication dated October 17, 1921, inclosing a letter from Stanley W. Ray, commissioner of public safety, New Orleans, La.

It is desired to advise you that no further information has been received relative to the releasing of the restriction from the expenditure of the appropriations made for the leprosarium, Carville, La.

It is hoped that some favorable word will be received in the very near future at which time it will be possible to accept a few of the lepers now under the jurisdiction of the State of Louisiana.

Respectfully,

C. C. PIERCE, Acting Surgeon General.

I understand that a resolution will shortly be introduced in Congress releasing from restriction the expenditures of the appropriation made for the leprosarium at Carville. That resolution should be adopted without delay and the Committee on Appropriations ought at once make the appropriation which will meet the crying demands and the needs of this so-called national institution and thereby in a measure cancel half a line of the disgrace and the shame that attaches to the administration of an institution which as it stands to-day is a stigma and a reproach to this Republic. I can not resist the temptation to read a short news article from the Washington Post:

ASK GIFTS FOR LEPERS—WASHINGTON AUXILIARY TO HAVE GATHERING NEXT FRIDAY.

The Washington Auxiliary Mission to Lepers will hold its semi-annual ingathering of gifts for outcast lepers in foreign countries Friday afternoon, November 4, in the Mount Vernon Methodist Episcopal Church South, Ninth Street and Massachusetts Avenue NW.

Lepers are supported in India, Burma, China, Korea, Japan, Siam, South America, and Africa. All gifts should be sent to the auxiliary treasurer, Mrs. Washington Topham, 43 U Street NW.

What a blistering indictment of the United States Government—gifts are being collected by good men and women for those who are "in the depths" in China, Korea, Japan, Siam, South America, and Africa on the assumption, of course, that those of our own country men and women who are in the "valley of death," whose only hymn is De Profundis, are well taken care of by the National Government and need not individual assistance, care, and gift.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I will.

Mr. MADDEN. I think there is no occasion for this outburst of complaint. To begin with, in the last appropriation bill there were about $4,080,000 provided for the Public Health Service for certain activities, $80,000 of which, at their own suggestion, was allotted to the cases referred to by the gentleman from Louisiana. Complaints have been made in certain sections of the country that the facilities were not adequate for the needs of these unfortunates, and some of these complaints have been addressed to me as the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. In every instance I have communicated with the Public Health Service and asked them to suggest what remedy could be applied. They finally have suggested a remedy, which is before us.

Mr. O'CONNOR. What is that remedy?

Mr. MADDEN. That remedy is to take an additional sum out of the $4,000,000 and add it to the $80,000 already available to meet the emergency. That has only been suggested yesterday, or within the last 24 hours.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Then my indictment goes to the Public Health Service and not to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. MADDEN. We have already provided for beginning hearings on this subject and other important subjects on next Monday.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Is not the gentleman from Illinois acquainted with the fact that there are 150 of these unfortunates who can not secure treatment in the leprosarium on account of poor housing facilities?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think there are 150. I have heard of five or six that they have not been able to provide for. But that does not matter; if there is only one, provision should be made for him. The Committee on Appropriations has already referred the matter to a subcommittee, and that subcommittee is to take the question up next Monday.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Do I understand from the gentleman that these complaints, based on not being able to secure proper provision, will be remedied by an adequate appropriation?

Mr. MADDEN. In the way they suggest, by taking from what money is already available for other purposes and adding it to this fund.

Mr. DUPRÉ. Do I not understand that the $80,000 was for maintenance only?

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. The newspapers say, and, of course, they never lie, that they have found a remedy for leprosy, complete and efficient, in Honolulu.

Mr. MADDEN. They have a good many cases in this country and they ought to be provided for, and as far as any recommendation that may come from the Committee on Appropriations, it will be adequate.

Mr. O'CONNOR. There are 150 cases throughout the country, and because we of Louisiana have transferred the institution to the United States Government we now find ourselves in a condition where we can not get our own lepers provided for. I am not complaining on behalf of those alone, but generally, and I am glad that the gentleman from Illinois assures me that these intolerable conditions will be remedied.

Mr. MADDEN. As far as I am concerned, and I am sure the Committee on Appropriations, all necessary provision will be made. [Applause.]

[By unanimous consent Mr. O'CONNOR was given leave to extend his remarks.]

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 10½ minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, this is a unanimous report from the Committee on the Public Lands of the House. The committee has given a great deal of thought, investigation, and consideration to this kind and character of legislation. For the United States we have passed an act entitled "An act to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands," approved June 22, 1910 (36 Stat., 583), and "An act to provide for agricultural entry of lands withdrawn, classified, or reported as containing phosphate, nitrate, potash, oil, gas, or asphaltic minerals," approved July 17, 1914 (38 Stat., 509), which provides for the homestead entries on coal land, oil and gas land in the United States, which is intended by this bill for the lands in Alaska. Following that, after a great deal of consideration by the committee and very extensive hearings and full consideration by the House, the House passed what is known as an act to provide for stock raising, homesteads, and other purposes, August 29, 1916, Thirty-ninth Statutes, page 671, which provides for the reservation of minerals, coal, gas, and oil under the stock raising, homestead act because of the extensiveness of the entries.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I see that the pending bill provides that the owner may mine this coal for domestic purposes. Does the domestic purpose embrace his own personal use, or can he mine it and sell it anywhere?

Mr. RAKER. It is for his own personal use, like the man may cut timber off his homestead for his own personal use for the purpose of improving his homestead. That has been the rule from the beginning as a public-land policy to the present time.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Under that provision would he not be permitted to sell the coal anywhere in Alaska for domestic use?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so.

Mr. JONES of Texas. For domestic use?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so. I think the construction of that term means the same as when a man has taken out a homestead and filed upon it, that he may use the land before final proof, may cut the timber on it for improvement and for his own use, but he may not speculate and use it as a market in disposing of the timber on that land.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Would the gentleman object to an amendment which would say "for his own personal use?"

Mr. RAKER. I would have no objection to that. I think that is what it means. It would be adding a few more words which are already in the proposed bill. It is not necessary.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman says that before final proof he may use that land.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What is the restriction after final proof?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, it is prior to the disposal by the United States of the coal deposits that he may use the coal.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Not thereafter.

Mr. RAKER. That is in this bill. The gentleman asked me what is meant by before final proof?

Mr. SINNOTT. The use must be on the land.

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What about the use of the coal for domestic use after the final proof is made? There is no limitation there that it shall be for his own domestic use.

Mr. RAKER. After final proof, after a man has complied with all of the necessary conditions and he has obtained a title, the Government can not take it from him once that final patent has been issued. In this case it provides for the use of the land for domestic purposes. That means for his own domestic purposes and not for sale to other people for their domestic purposes. This bill provides for three classes: First, those who desire to make homesteads on land containing the various minerals, coal, oil, and gas; second, it provides a second class, composed of those who have heretofore and who now have homestead filings for which they can not make final proof or obtain patent because the land does contain coal, oil, or gas. He is permitted to make his final proof by reserving those minerals to the Government. The third class is provided for in the bill on page 2, lines 5 to 10. That is, the land is not conclusive as to the matter of mineral land, and it is believed to be all nonmineral, but before he makes his final proof should the minerals named be discovered, in that event he can, nevertheless, make final proof by virtue of relinquishing or saving to the Government the coal, gas, or oil that is in the land. There are the three classes provided for. All of the minerals, coal, oil, and gas are reserved to the Government and to the three classes specified. Answering the suggestion made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] that it may affect the water power, permit me to say that under all of the water-power withdrawals today in Alaska, under this bill, no homestead can ever be initiated. So, if there are any water powers withdrawn, and they have withdrawn all they thought were possible, under the bill no homesteader can initiate homestead claims.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose they have not been withdrawn?

Mr. RAKER. Oh, my dear friend from Massachusetts, they have withdrawn so infernally much land and figured and speculated so much, that wherever there is a canyon or a possibility of a reservoir site or a reservoir it is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. That is up in Alaska?

Mr. RAKER. In Alaska it is pretty nearly all withdrawn. Do give these people an opportunity to develop their country as we are trying to develop the country in the West.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it not true that every power site on the public domain, including Alaska, was withdrawn under Mr. Taft's administration and is still withdrawn?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and then some. Everyone knows from experience in the Eastern States and elsewhere, where they have had mines for a century, where the coal mines are still in operation—and the same is true in England—that the mining of the coal or the taking out of the oil does not detract from the continued and prosperous development of the country for agricultural purposes.

Last week I had occasion to go through Pennsylvania, and I saw coal mines and oil wells on agricultural land. Are you going to say that you will prohibit the agricultural development of that land when at the same time you can develop it to its highest extent for agricultural purposes and develop all of the mineral that is in the land without interference with either one? That is the purpose of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. Sometimes it kind of hurts a little, although we do not complain. We think that some of you good eastern friends of ours are a little bit penurious in respect to this matter. You received all of the land and the minerals within the land and the coal and everything else, up to the blue heavens above, but within the last few years you have asked us to yield every character of minerals in the land out West. We began to see that you had the votes and that we could not do anything. We had to do something, so what have we done? We have passed laws, so far as the United States is concerned, reserving the minerals, the coal, oil, and gas, and the oil shale to the Government of the United States. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. What minerals and metals are reserved in this bill outside of coal, oil, and gas?

Mr. RAKER. Not any.

Mr. WALSH. In this instance you have not passed such a law, have you?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and I am very glad the gentleman asked me that, because I was afraid I was about to forget it. That has been the history of this country. We have yielded our lands for the purpose of leasing, to give you something in return. Ought you not to be satisfied?

Mr. WALSH. Whose land?

Mr. RAKER. The land that rightfully belongs to the people who settle there. The people who go into that country and are willing to settle there ought to have the land, if they comply with proper regulations and make it productive, and in that way it will return a revenue to the Government in the way of taxation and will serve to build up the citizenry of the country. To answer the suggestion of the gentleman, not in Alaska, not in the United States, at any place, to-day can any man file a homestead on mineral lands containing gold, silver, cinnabar, or otherwise, because all mineral lands are withdrawn from homestead entry.

Mr. WALSH. Are there any mineral lands in Alaska?

Mr. RAKER. I say it without fear of contradiction that none of the mineral lands, mark the words, none of the mineral lands——

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. None?

Mr. RAKER. Well, Jehoshaphat! You can find something on some lands for some benefit 100 years after it has been discovered. Ought you to say to a man that he can not build a factory on his land if it becomes necessary after 100 years, and he can find some new enterprise to develop there? So will all of the known minerals, gold and silver, cinnabar, or any other mineral of that character. You say we can not homestead there? You can take it up under the mineral law in Alaska and in this country. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAKER. When a man gets interested, just at that point he is shut off. I ask that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, after the very able exposition of this bill by the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. SUTHERLAND] last Tuesday and after the very able and luminous explanation by the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] I feel that it is not necessary to take further time in discussing the bill. I just wish to advert to one comment of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] regarding the water-power sites. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] covered that very fully, but I wish to add that I spoke to Judge Finney, of the Interior Department, this morning regarding the water-power sites, and he told me that all the water-power sites in Alaska have been withdrawn, so the water-power sites would not be open to entry under this act.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. For a question.

Mr. WALSH. Is that a blanket law that includes water-power sites which may not have been discovered?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, they have gone up there and investigated and surveyed all the water-power sites and they have been withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. So there are no water-power sites in the Territory of Alaska now that have not been withdrawn?

Mr. SINNOTT. That have not been withdrawn. They have all been withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I doubt it. They may think they have withdrawn them all, but I doubt it was possible to make a sufficient exploration of that country to say, in view of the future development of water power and the utilization of water as a source of power, that they have withdrawn all these water-power sites.

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, if the gentleman is at all familiar or has investigated or will investigate the matter of water-power withdrawals throughout the country, he will know or find out that those interested in the water-power sites on behalf of the Government have gone over the whole country with a fine-tooth comb. You will find water-power withdrawals covering land 2,000 feet above the Deschutes River in Oregon on land that will never be needed in connection with power development. They overwithdraw, as a matter of fact, water-power sites. Then I want to get this point clearly fixed in the minds of the committee, that at no time under this bill or under a patent issued by virtue of this bill can anyone acquire any coal, oil, or gas rights. No homestead settler under this bill can acquire any rights to the coal except a limited right for his domestic purposes upon the land. Now, under a similar act that applies to the United States proper, there is the same provision, and the department found it to be a reasonable provision. There have been no abuses or violations of the provisions. The Secretary of the Interior or the Assistant Secretary, Judge Finney, who reported on this bill, calls attention to the fact that it is similar to a law which has been in vogue in the United States since 1910 as far as coal is concerned, and since 1914 as far as oil and gas are concerned, and it has proven satisfactory.

Mr. Chairman, I ask for a reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act homestead claims may be initiated by actual settlers on public lands of the United States in Alaska known to contain workable coal, oil, or gas deposits, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein, and which are not otherwise reserved or withdrawn, whenever such claim shall be initiated with a view of obtaining or passing title with a reservation to the United States of the coal, oil, or gas in such lands, and of the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same; and any settler who has prior to the passage of this act initiated a homestead claim in good faith on lands containing workable deposits of coal, oil, or gas, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein and not otherwise reserved or withdrawn, may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which the claim was initiated, but shall receive the limited patent provided for in this act: Provided, however, That should it be discovered at any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character, the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I did not ask for time in general debate and would not unduly ask time of the committee now, but I should like to discuss some features of this bill at some length, and I ask unanimous consent to continue for 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 15 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the legislation now before us is almost identical in its terms with the act applying to the States and the public lands within the States which became a law on July 17, 1914. I have taken a great deal of interest in this legislation because I introduced the first bill which was introduced in the Congress to save for the homestead settlers, lands that after entry were proven to contain coal, their rights to the land that they so entered with the reservation to the Government of the coal deposit. Following that I introduced the bill that became the act to which I have referred, the act of July 17, 1914. It is highly important legislation for many reasons. First, because it for the first time made possible the acquisition of title to lands valuable for certain classes of minerals under the homestead act. Second, because it provided for a new form of title, a form of title new to American statutes, a title carrying practically all the rights and privileges of a fee title with the reservation to the Government of the body of a mineral or of certain minerals named in the law.

The act of 1914 applies not only to coal and oil but to certain other nonmetalliferous minerals. This act is confined to coal, oil, and gas. The Committee on the Public Lands had the original act under consideration for a long time. The bill as finally enacted differed considerably from the bill as originally introduced, for at the time the bill was originally introduced I did not have—no one on the committee had—a very clear idea as to just the phraseology that should be employed to protect the homestead settler or the land entrymen, and he who was to become the owner, in his legitimate rights, and at the same time not interfere with legitimate mining development. But the law as drawn was intended and purposed to protect the owner. Some people, including some in the land office, have fallen into the unhappy and unfortunate error of referring to the title under these laws as surface titles. That is not an accurate designation of the title. It is much more than a surface title. It gives the entryman the ownership of the land from the surface as far down as he can ever reach, and everything in it save and alone the body of the reserved minerals; nothing above them, nothing below them is reserved.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

That is a new form of title under our laws. It does another thing. Starting in with those provisions which protect the owner of the land, it then protects the prospector or he who becomes the owner of the mineral by granting him the right of reentry, the right of reentering the tract and securing as much of the tract as it is necessary for him to have in order to properly conduct his mining operations.

I have sometimes said that if there is any one piece of legislation above another that I feel I have the right to take special pride in this is the act, because it settled what had been a long-continuing controversy, it made possible a class of ownership and settlement that had been impossible under our laws, and, as finally enacted, it fully protects not only the homesteader and the agriculturist but the miner as well. At the time this bill was before the House there was in Congress, from the State of California, a gentleman by the name of Smith. Mr. Smith, in my opinion—I am sorry he is not on earth to hear again the statement that I now make and that I have made before—was entitled to more credit than anyone of us for the final working out of the theory under which this new class of title was evolved and this new policy of joint use was finally crystallized into law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I would like to know if it was the 1914 law that you were speaking of?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes. There was an act which I introduced prior to that which took care of the entrymen who were then on the public lands.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The act of 1910?

Mr. MONDELL. The act of 1914 followed and was supplemental to that act. The law of 1910 did not fully provide for the theory of limited titles which was finally fully developed and enacted in the statute of 1914.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. SINNOTT. The law of 1910 just covered the coal lands.

Mr. MONDELL. Just covered coal; that is true. The necessity for its enactment grew out of the fact that in the Dakotas, in Colorado and Wyoming, and in various other Western States, homestead entrymen had settled upon vast areas of land that were known to contain coal at varying depths, but coal that at that particular time had no commercial value.

It should be remembered—and I think some gentlemen have not had it very clearly in mind, judging by some of the questions asked—that the homesteader, the entryman, under any agricultural land statute, makes a nonmineral affidavit before he can acquire any standing as an entryman. He must swear that he has examined the land he proposes to acquire and that it is more valuable for agricultural purposes than for mineral of any sort or kind. And if it shall be proven at any time up to the date when his patent is issued that the land does, in fact, contain minerals of any sort or kind, rendering it more valuable for mineral than for agricultural purposes, his claim falls and his title is extinguished.

Now, this statute of 1914, following the statute of 1910, was the first modification of that general rule. It modified the rule only with regard to certain nonmetalliferous minerals, and in the case of this act modifies the rule only with regard to coal, oil, and gas. It is, in my opinion, a most excellent statute. It has stood the test of use and administration now for about six years, and I think there have been very few cases where any question has arisen as to the wisdom of the provisions of this act.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not know anything about the land laws that amounts to much, and therefore I want some information. I would gather from the first section of this bill, lines 12 and 13 on the first page, and the first five lines on page 2, that if a homesteader had settled on a homestead claim in good faith and proceeded, thinking that he could finally get a patent to a fee of the land, if it were found out afterwards that there was coal, oil, or gas on the land, his patent would be limited.

Now, the question, in my mind, is this, Whether that is treating the settler just exactly fairly when he assumed all along that the patent he would get would be a patent to the fee of the land?

Mr. MONDELL. Whether that is treating him fairly or not, the Members from the public land States have traveled that road many times and in connection with many proposals of legislation for years, and have agreed to the proposition that the entryman is chargeable with knowledge of the fact that his land is valuable for mineral, and that inasmuch as he is not seeking the mineral, but the agricultural values of the land, he is treated fairly, if there shall be a discovery prior to his making final proof, if he receives the land with the reservation to the Government of minerals. That has been settled. It was settled in the act of 1910, and in the act of 1914, and that is not in question here. The question here is whether you shall give the settler his land at all, because under the present law his title fails if mineral shall be discovered in paying quantities before he has earned his title.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. This is a good law. It is a necessary statute. It has worked well. All laws relating to the acquisition of public lands are necessarily to a greater or less extent subject to abuse; this law is perhaps as little subject to abuse as any statute of this sort can be. I do not imagine that anyone in Alaska, in the Matanuska and Bering field, where the land is of no value for agricultural purposes, will endeavor to acquire one of these limited rights. I am sure that under a proper administration of the land laws no homestead settler in Alaska would be allowed to make a filing on land that was clearly, beyond all question, of no real or considerable value for agricultural or grazing purposes. There are some coal lands in Alaska that are of that character. You can not well define in this statute the limitation of agricultural entries. That is defined in the homestead statutes, and in future modifications of the homestead statutes in Alaska it will be necessary to have in mind the fact of the passage of this bill, so that it shall not be legal, as it is now, in my opinion, under proper administration, to file a homestead on barren rocks in the hope of securing some benefit out of the development of mineral.

That is the only possible danger under a statute like this.

But there is one provision of this act that has not always worked altogether satisfactorily in our continental area, and yet up to this time I have not been able to suggest any certain remedy. The bill provides, among other things, that after the entry has been made the prospector may enter upon the land only upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops or improvements on such land by reason of such prospecting. In practical administration that provision protects the owner sometimes to the detriment of the prospector, because of the period of time required to file with the Secretary the bond and to secure from him the prospecting permission. However, the department has by its methods of administration largely, and perhaps wholly, cured that situation in our continental area. But Alaska is a long way from the seat of government, and I think the gentleman from Alaska and others directly charged with the responsibility there——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. We may very properly consider the advisability of some modification of that provision. What happens in practice in cases of this kind very frequently is this: The prospector, believing that there is coal or oil upon the land, does not go to the trouble of securing a permit from the Secretary; he simply makes an arrangement with the owner. I am not sure whether the department has ever recognized those agreements as valid. So long as neither party raises a question, no third party can. It is a matter between the owner of the title and the prospector. But some time some serious damage will occur under an agreement of that kind, and then the question will have to be decided as to whether or not we really contemplated an agreement with the settler.

That could be very easily settled by an amendment after the word "therein" on page 3, line 2, by the addition of these words, "under agreement with the entryman or owner under the limited patent provided for by this act." That would make it clear that that kind of an agreement, which is common, could be entered into legally. If the Secretary himself must pass upon these cases—I can imagine conditions under which in Alaska that would involve considerable delay—whether it is safe to provide that the register or receiver, under certain conditions, could do that I do not know.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Or the judge of the court——

Mr. MONDELL. No; I would not favor vesting that power in officials who are in no wise connected with or familiar with the land machinery. It should be left with an official who is acquainted with the practices of the land office, and the register and receiver naturally would be the ones who should be authorized to do that. But whether we authorize that provision or not, I am inclined to believe it would be well to place in the statute the language I have referred to. That makes it clear beyond question that if the owner of the title enters into an agreement with the prospector the prospector need not file a bond and secure the permission provided for.

Mr. STEPHENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS. I wanted to ask about the prospector, whether anyone would have the privilege of going on the owner's land without first getting permission from the Government?

Mr. MONDELL. Under the bill they must first get permission from the Secretary of the Interior and file a bond.

Mr. WYANT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. WYANT. In mining coal in Pennsylvania it frequently happens that property and buildings are destroyed, very valuable property. What protection is given here against that?

Mr. MONDELL. This bill protects the owner of the property fully. There is no doubt about that. It is a well-drawn statute on that point.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The suggestion that the gentleman made in regard to the owner of the surface consenting would be quite applicable if the law of Alaska provided that the land should be under lease. You can not get mineral title in Alaska except under lease.

Mr. MONDELL. Title to what?

Mr. RAKER. To coal, oil, and gas.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true as far as the public lands of the United States are concerned. The question is merely this: They do make these arrangements. They make arrangements with the owner of the surface rather than apply to the Secretary. The question is whether the law contemplates these things.

Mr. RAKER. What I mean is, before the man can mine, in any event he must get some permission from the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. MONDELL. Under this law the only permission that he has to get is the permission of the Secretary protecting the entryman, because the other provision of the law is that he may enter the land if he is qualified to secure the title. Of course, he would make the application for a prospector's permit, and all that sort of thing, but that does not necessarily carry him to Washington. This other thing does.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. I desire to submit this to the gentleman from Wyoming: Has he thought of this feature of that? Under an act passed in the last Congress covering Alaska coal lands, and also under the oil leasing act, the Secretary of the Interior may grant a prospecting permit, and if oil or coal is discovered then the prospector has a preference right for a lease. Now, if you leave this matter in the hands of the homesteader, the landowner, we might be giving him the right to grant a permit that would ripen into a lease, and he may not know whether the applicant is qualified under the law to receive a lease.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me; in other days I had a very considerable amount of experience in prospecting for minerals, particularly oil and coal. There is a certain amount of preliminary prospecting or examination that needs to be done before the prospector can have a very definite opinion as to whether he wants to go to the expense and trouble of pressing for a permit and a lease. Query: In that condition of affairs relative to exploration work, shall we leave the entryman in the position where he may feel that he must deny to the prospector the opportunity even to pass over his land? He has a perfect right to do that under the law. He may warn off all trespassers. Query: Should we not make it clear that he has an opportunity to allow this preliminary prospecting? I simply make that suggestion. I am not sure that it will meet with the approval of the committee. It is intended to meet partially the only difficulty that I know of with regard to the administration of the law at present.

Mr. SINNOTT. There is nothing in this law or in the law as it relates to the United States, as far as I know, that would prohibit the settler from permitting the prospector to go over his land.

Mr. MONDELL. There is not?

Mr. SINNOTT. No.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman from Oregon yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I want to ask the gentleman if he thinks that the reservation as to coal, oil, and gas is sufficient to protect the Government? Ought there not to be a reservation as to other minerals?

Mr. SINNOTT. This same law applies to the United States. It has been on the statute books for 10 years as far as coal is concerned, and since 1914 as far as oil is concerned, and it has proven satisfactory.

Mr. PARRISH. Other minerals are not specified in this bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. If there are metalliferous minerals the man could not get his title.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. If it were known.

Mr. PARRISH. How about gold?

Mr. SINNOTT. He could not get title at all. There is an absolute prohibition against giving title to any land containing gold.

Mr. PARRISH. That is under another act of Congress. Does that same protection obtain as to any other minerals?

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes.

Mr. PARRISH. Silver and gold?

Mr. SINNOTT. Silver and gold, and all those minerals.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If it were unknown that the gold was there and a man went ahead and got title, would the subsequent discovery of the gold forfeit his title?

Mr. SINNOTT. Not unless it could be proven that he knew the gold was there at the time he made his final proof.

Mr. JONES of Texas. What objection is there to reserving other minerals?

Mr. SINNOTT. There are many objections to that. It has not been our policy.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I am going to offer an amendment now as to metals and minerals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired. Without objection the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The gentleman from New Jersey offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

The clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey to section 1: Insert the words "metal or mineral" after the word "gas" in line 6, page 1, and in line 8, page 2; and insert the words "metals or minerals" after the word "gas" in lines 7 and 10 of page 1, and lines 1 and 2 of page 2.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. I reserve a point of order against the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon reserves the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I thoroughly sympathize with the purpose of this bill. Any man who can find farming land in Alaska—there is only a little of it there—ought to be able to settle on it wherever it may be, subject to the mining of the ores, metals, coal, oil, and gas.

This is not a new thing, as suggested by the leader of the House. It is new in statute, but it is not new in practice. In my State almost all the mines are worked, not by the owner of the soil, but under reservations contained in old deeds "reserving all mines, metals, and minerals in said tract, with the right to explore for, search, and mine the same, paying all damage to the owner of the soil"; and we have never had any difficulty in carrying that out. If a man were going to cause great damage, a court of equity would enjoin his going beyond mere exploration until he gave proper security. That method works.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman misunderstood me. I said this is the first legislation of this kind in the way of a Federal statute making this separation.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I have said that it is the first statute, but it is an old practice under title by deed in my State. Now, I think the facts with reference to metal, mineral, coal, and oil lands are mighty uncertain. You can not tell where they are. A gold vein may be 1,000 feet deep. An iron vein I heard of in Prince of Wales Island is 60 feet wide, running from one side of the island to the other. It has not been a valuable mine to work, the iron being mixed with copper, which they do not know how to get out. It will be valuable. It is not mineral land now, but it will be. In the north, near Fairbanks, stream after stream has been worked by placer miners for gold in the bed of the stream, mined by the stream from the mother veins. It is said that one vein has been discovered that yielded a lot of ore averaging $200 in gold per ton. But the working of these veins or mines must be preserved from being broken up by putting a homestead over the land at the top. You may want to mine 1,000 feet deep under the surface of the soil, and it will do no harm whatever to the farm. In my State we run a shaft down, and there are only a few acres around the shaft that are occupied by buildings. The farmer carries on his farm and he is glad to have the mine there, because people come there and use his crops. They put up buildings and improve the place. We want to see that the mining works of all kinds are carried on without interference with the soil, and that the soil may be cultivated without interference with the mine. It is simple and practical. It ought to have existed always in all the United States as it did in the Eastern States under reservations in the deeds.

Now, I want to point out what there is here. The whole northern part of Alaska is an absolute blank. Not a river has been surveyed, and there are rivers there. The central part of Alaska contains a blank 200 or 300 miles in extent, and so in the southwestern part. We only know of the placer mining in the beds of the river, where untold richness existed.

Now we shall want to go to the mines themselves, the mother veins, which mostly have not been discovered. I understood from the chairman of the committee that very few lands in Alaska have been reserved for coal, oil, and minerals.

Mr. SINNOTT. The law reserves them.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The law reserves them when they are known. If not known they are not reserved. We are dealing with the unknown, and title ought not to be given to a homestead on a most important vein that would block that development. Mining is different from the operations on the surface. The farmer should be protected, and the Government should be protected also in seeing that the great resources of this Territory are developed. There are some few places in favored spots in the valleys where farms could be placed, and there may be other parts—I have no doubt there are some in the southeastern part where there is coal and iron. There are gold mines at Juneau, and there is copper on the Copper River, and there may be a great deal more.

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Certainly.

Mr. BOX. Does the gentleman construe the act as reserving the minerals in lands not known to contain minerals?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. It reserves the coal but it does not reserve the minerals. My amendment reserves the minerals.

Mr. BOX. I call the gentleman's attention to the language in line 5, page 1, "lands of the United States in Alaska known to contain workable coal, oil, or gas deposits." I want to ask the gentleman, Is this reservation of coal, oil, and gas on land not known at the time of the entry?

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I do not know whether it does or not. If it does not, it ought to be made to do so. My purpose is to reserve all of the mineral rights. You can mine under the farm and pay the damages for the injury to the surface. It is the sensible way of doing. What I argue is that the act should be universal. I should very much have preferred to introduce an act like our reservations in our deeds, simply saying that homestead entries may be made everywhere, except in forest reserves or on the banks of streams, as already provided in the statutes in respect to Alaska, or in other places excepted by the statutes, but that metals—gold, coal, oil, or gas—under the land shall be reserved to the United States and its grantees, always with the right to search for, explore, mine, and acquire the same, subject to the payment to the owner of the soil of all damage done to his estate. It would have been a short act and be complete and a great deal broader than this one.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose this amendment. I do not think the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] fully appreciates the situation and the conditions in a placer mining country. No one who is looking for metalliferous minerals like gold or silver is going to try to get that gold or silver under the provisions of this act. This is a homestead law. A man would have to live upon that land for three years and cultivate 20 acres. As a rule, it takes them about five years to secure a patent. If at any time during those five years it is shown that there are metalliferous minerals, gold or silver, upon the land, the homestead claimant absolutely loses his title, and his rights fall. If at any time after he secures his patent it is shown that he knew when he took up the land, or at any time prior to his final proof, that the land contained those minerals, then again he loses his right. It is much cheaper to take up the land under the placer mining law than to take it up under the homestead law. No mining man who knows anything about the homestead law or about the provisions of the mineral laws would ever undertake to secure a gold claim or a silver claim through the instrumentality of this bill if it becomes a law, because he can take it up much more cheaply under the mineral laws as they relate to Alaska. So far for the objection that this law might be used for that purpose.

Let us go to the other proposition. I do not think the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has ever been in a mining section where placer mining is carried on. Placer mining and homesteading and farming are absolutely incompatible. You ought to see some of these placer mines. I have seen farms purchased for the placer mining upon them. The whole farm is torn up; it is made an absolute ruin; it is made a havoc. Where formerly there were beautiful fields of wheat, hay, clover, or alfalfa, as there were in my district, they come along with a great, big dredge—and some of those dredges are almost as large as this room—and the whole surface of the country is torn up and gouged out, and when they get through there is nothing left upon the surface but a great big mass of rocks and bowlders.

The gentleman from New Jersey wants to reserve to some mineral claimants coming along after the man secures his patent the right to practically take his farm away from him, and that is what would happen if the amendment offered by the gentleman should be agreed to. The two propositions are absolutely incompatible. He may have had some metalliferous mining in his State where they put down a shaft that would not inconvenience the farmer, but the situation in a placer country like Alaska is absolutely different. You would absolutely ruin and destroy a man's homestead.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. As a matter of fact, would it not mean that eight individuals would be able to come along and occupy the man's homestead under the mineral laws.

Mr. SINNOTT. One individual could do it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not under the laws of Alaska.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, yes; he could cover that homestead with eight placer claims.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. One individual?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; one individual.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Not under the law of Alaska.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; he can. He can take up only two claims a month, and during the year he can take up eight placer claims and clap those eight placer claims upon the land of the homesteader.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes; but the gentleman would not say that one individual would be able to do that.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If he had located it. But suppose other individuals had come along.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, somebody else could come along and help to plaster the farm with claims.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And that means that eight men would preempt the surface rights of this homesteader.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. What would be the situation if a homesteader made final proof, occupied the land for three years after his final proof and did not know anything about certain minerals other than gold or silver being beneath the surface, and they were then discovered in large quantities. To whom would that belong?

Mr. SINNOTT. That would belong just the same as it does in the United States—to the man who receives the patent, and why should he not have it? For whom are you going to reserve it? Who is going to have it unless he has it? Some rich mining man will come along and get it—is that the idea? Is not the homesteader as much entitled to that as somebody else? The United States does not reserve it for itself. All these lands are now open for mineral claimants, and why not give it to the homesteader as well as to some mining promoter?

Mr. WALSH. To whom would it belong if it happened before final proof?

Mr. SINNOTT. If that man discovered mineral upon his land before final proof, if he had any sagacity he would immediately file a claim.

Mr. WALSH. To whom would it belong if it was discovered before final proof and he did not file a claim?

Mr. SINNOTT. It would belong to the United States and would belong to the first man that clapped a claim on it.

Mr. EVANS. What is the size of a placer claim?

Mr. SINNOTT. Twenty acres.
Mr. EVANS. What is the size of a homestead?
Mr. SINNOTT. In Alaska, 160 acres.
Mr. EVANS. If one wished to get up a scheme by which he could take up and cover the whole country, what better way would he have than the gentleman's bill?
Mr. SINNOTT. He can take up eight placer claims.
Mr. EVANS. And you would have to take up each separately and make the proof in the ordinary way, would you not?
Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no; I could take up eight placer claims——
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has again expired.
Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?
There was no objection.
Mr. SINNOTT. I could take up eight placer claims and that would entirely cover the homestead, or I could get eight friends of mine and have each take up a claim and work it.
We will do our work upon one claim, provided that work would develop all the claims; but why take this away from the homesteader and give it to somebody else?
Mr. EVANS. Why not require him, in order to secure the mineral rights, to do just what he would have had to do under the law if he was not a homesteader?
Mr. SINNOTT. If he discovered it before final proof he will have to comply with the law; after final proof he is not going to get that mineral unless he puts his muscle and his money into going into the bowels of the earth.
Mr. EVANS. Would he get it at all without putting his muscle into it?
Mr. SINNOTT. Not at all. This gold does not lie on the surface of the earth——
Mr. EVANS. I know——
Mr. SINNOTT. And somebody has got to work.
Mr. EVANS. Suppose the lead ran through that; would he be entitled to it after getting a patent under the homestead right?
Mr. SINNOTT. No; he would not; because the apex of the lead is on the adjoining claim, and the owner of that apex can follow it, under the mineral laws.
Mr. EVANS. Not if he has a patent to it.
Mr. SINNOTT. Certainly he would. I hope the committee will not adopt the proposition submitted by the gentleman from New Jersey. The homesteader is as well entitled to this as some mineral claimant. What sanctity surrounds the mineral claimant?
Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SINNOTT. I will yield to the gentleman.
Mr. WALSH. Well, as a matter of fact this bill is presented to take care of a relatively small number of settlers in the vicinity of Cook Inlet, but it is made general in its application, is it not?
Mr. SINNOTT. Of course, the bill is general in its application, and so is the homestead law general in its application.
Mr. WALSH. But the homestead law does not apply to Alaska.
Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.
Mr. WALSH. To these coal lands?
Mr. SINNOTT. The homestead law applies to Alaska.
Mr. WALSH. To these coal lands?
Mr. SINNOTT. It does not apply to the coal lands. Now, in Alaska there have been withdrawn, or been classified, rather, 600,000 acres of coal lands. The Geological Survey reports that there is a possibility of 10,000,000 acres of coal, oil, and gas lands in Alaska, and unless we pass this bill, why, anyone that happens to uncover a vein of coal on his homestead will lose his five years' work on that farm. The amendment suggested by the gentleman from New Jersey is absolutely incompatible with the purposes of this act. Alaska is a great placer-mining country, and I do not think any farmer or any homesteader would take up land with the possibility of the danger staring him in the face that some big mining company is going to come along and scrape or dredge from the surface of his farm all the soil there is and leave it a heaping mass of rocks and bowlders, an eyesore for all time.
Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and so that I may properly explain it and the matter involved, I ask that I may proceed for five minutes without interruption.
Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can proceed for five minutes without interruption without any unanimous consent.
Mr. RAKER. I mean 10 minutes. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield so as to answer my question as he goes along?
Mr. RAKER. I yield and will try to do so if I can.
Mr. PARRISH. As I understand this bill, if a certificate was issued, and then the coal, oil, or gas and other minerals be known, the man filing will get the coal, oil, gas, or minerals under that piece of land that he files upon?
Mr. RAKER. I will try to answer that as I go along; do not let me forget it.
Mr. PARRISH. It is on that point that I would like to have some light.
Mr. RAKER. Oh, I want to present this in a consecutive way if I can. Now, without any egotism, and I trust the committee will pardon me, there is no district in the United States or in the world that has the extended or has had the extended placer mining as in the now second congressional district of California. At one time a greater part of it was under placer mining. We originated the developing of gold in the West by placer mining. It developed from a man having a claim 5 feet wide and 20 feet long, was extended to 150 feet wide and 100 feet long, until finally, after they worked out the better part of the placer claims they fixed it by law under the system of mining in California at 300 feet on either side and 1,500 feet long, making 20 acres, so that a man can get eight of them, get 160 acres on as much placer ground as there is undeveloped public land. There is no limit. It has worked well, successfully, and properly. The only question that has ever been raised about it is the adding of the placer mining law to gas and oil, and we have eliminated that now by virtue of the leasing bills. In placer mining the purpose is to wash away and tear the ground to pieces. That ought to be understood, and that is what they have done in California; that is what they will do in every place where there is placer mining.
Some of the country comes back and some does not and never will. Of course, quartz mining is different. It may be understood, as asked by the gentleman from Kansas, that if you find an apex on the tract of land you may run it out, if it runs a thousand feet or more. You can run to the end of the quartz itself.
Mr. EVANS. If you stay within your walls?
Mr. VAILE. Within the lines.
Mr. EVANS. The side lines.
Mr. VAILE. You can run the side lines to any distance.
Mr. RAKER. That is a law peculiar to the West, first, as to placer mining, and then, next, as to quartz mining, separate and distinct regulations, and they have been passed upon by all the western courts and the courts of the United States. Now, the amendment which has been offered here is, of course, offered in good faith, but by people who do not understand the situation and do not know what is on the statutes. Now, I say that in all sincerity, and I am going to prove it.
Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. RAKER. For a question.
Mr. EVANS. Under the terms of this bill as it is now presented if coal or oil are not discovered until after final proof are they reserved?
Mr. RAKER. Yes; and I will demonstrate it. I am going to answer the first part first and then if you will give me sufficient time I will answer the other.
Now, let us get down to the question of the amendment to place upon this the metalliferous minerals. They are mined under different conditions and handled under different conditions, and different rules and regulations govern. As the gentleman from Arkansas has well said, you want to destroy a man's farm if it becomes necessary.
I do not know whether or not you appreciate that 99 per cent of all the placer mining claims have been discovered by reason of washing the soil to determine whether there are any traces of mineral there, and they have never found any placer mining claims except upon the surface. What is the use of trying to camouflage the business?
Second, if they find a placer mining claim by virtue of washing the soil, and they run out a tunnel, and they find the tunnel runs under a mountain 20 or 30 miles, and 5,000 feet below the top of the mountain, they know if they follow the tunnel they will find the gold. That is the placer feature of it. That is discovered in advance. Now, as to the question of the quartz mining, most of it has been discovered, and will be discovered, by virtue of some indication of the placer by washing out the earth and determining whether there are traces of gold in it; and, second, by the float that is found upon the side hills that the old prospector has developed and has given his lifetime to. And they begin to seek to find some outcropping. It may not be at the place, but at another place. And then they will dig down and run into the veins of quartz containing gold. That is the way the placer and quartz mines have been discovered in the West and also in Alaska.

Mr. COLTON. Is it not a fact that the difference between coal and oil and gas and other minerals is this: That the only way you can acquire title to coal and oil is by lease, while under other minerals a man can keep his title by filing locations under it, under which he would get a fee-simple title? So that if a man filed a homestead claim the title would be constantly clouded, and he could not get a title for coal, oil, and gas. So there is a difference between the two classes of minerals.

Mr. RAKER. Under the laws of the United States in Alaska all the coal and gas lands are handled by leases and not by filing upon them, as in former days. And in the United States the land is open in all the reserves, except military reserves, and possibly in the public parks, and only a few of those. In all these great territories you merely graze the land of the forest reserve. We have left them open to the prospector so that he may determine whether or not there is gold or silver in those lands, for the benefit of the country, as it ought to be.

Now, under the law, since 1872, and it is made applicable to Alaska, you can not obtain title. I hope the Members will bear that in mind, as also my friend from Nebraska. It has been the law from the beginning that you can not obtain title to mineral lands, lands containing gold or silver, that contain sufficient of that metal to be commercial, by homestead, desert claims, timber claims, or otherwise. You can only acquire under the law provided for the acquiring of mineral lands. And the books are full, the statutes are full, and the authorities are clear, and all the regulations of the Department of the Interior lay down the rule that until the final proof is made, if there are traces of gold of any kind, or of silver, upon the land that might lead to a commercial product from that land, you can not obtain a patent to the land as a homestead.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Let me have five minutes, and then I will have finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAKER. Now, we have the case of a man in Alaska, under the present law, where he has the right to go and obtain a title to mineral lands, not by lease but by discovery and in compliance with the law in regard to it. And the same is true in the United States. The purpose of this bill now is to turn over the metalliferous deposits of the country, the mining interests, that have amounted in the past to a condition where a man's property interest will be torn up and destroyed, when there is not one case in a thousand up to the present time where a man has obtained a patent to Government land that there has been gold and silver found upon the land that was not known before the patent was issued. Now, that is the situation.

Mr. WALSH. Is it not true that Alaska is more rich in mineral and metal resources than any other section?

Mr. RAKER. I do not think so.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Geological Survey say so?

Mr. RAKER. It says this, like in California, on 500 acres that were immensely rich because they took out from $3,000,000 to $5,000,000——

Mr. WALSH. That is gold. I mean other metals.

Mr. RAKER. That is provided for. They have their coal, oil, and gas, a few wells. That is provided for in this bill. The balance of it is all reserved now, and the real placer mining in Alaska to a great extent has been worked over.

Let me tell you, those old prospectors and miners know how to get the gold placers out of the country. The remaining part is in the quartz, and the other part is in these old channels of the river which are covered up, which they will have to work out. If there is a reasonable amount of gold there now they know where it is. If a man files on it, an official from the Geological Survey immediately appears and says, "It is mineral land," and the man can get no patent as a homesteader.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I will.

Mr. WALSH. Is the report true that we have seen in the press that in the gentleman's own State of California they have made recent discoveries of gold by new processes in mines or locations that had previously been worked and abandoned?

Mr. RAKER. Well, yes. It is all right. A man ought to have it. We find a change in the district represented by the gentleman from Nevada [Mr. ARENTZ] where the old trail crossed and where the pioneers went over it, and where all the scientists in the world had inspected it for 50 years and had said there was no mineral in the land. The man who still kept his land there discovered on it two of the best mines in the world.

Mr. WALSH. Was that a gold mine?

Mr. RAKER. Yes. He was watching it for 50 years, the grandfather and the father and the boys after him. He was entitled to it. But here you are trying to change the entire laws of the United States and of Alaska as to the mining of metalliferous ores, putting it in with coal, oil, and gas. You have protected the people; you have protected the Government. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] is very keen in watching every little tract of land in the West. I am afraid he has not been over it. He says, "We just go and rent a piece of land up in New Jersey and reserve all the minerals." The original grantor got it all and is still trying to hog everything in sight. Do you know that notwithstanding this reservation of minerals in Kansas and Missouri and in Wisconsin and Minnesota they did not even reserve these minerals to the Government in the way they did in the far Western States?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. CURRY, Mr. VAILE, and Mr. WALSH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] will be recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I do not see what justice or equity there is in having one land law for Alaska and another law for the rest of the United States. Under the bill the gas and the coal and the oil and the timber are reserved. What reason is there to reserve the other minerals in Alaska any more than in California, Nevada, or Montana? We have an immense unoccupied territory in Alaska, one-fifth of the size of the United States, occupied by only 27,000 white people, 10,000 less than there were 10 years ago. The reason there are less people there now is because of the laws enacted by Congress to discourage its development.

Now, when we wish to pass a law to give a man a title to 160 acres of land so that we can induce the right kind of men and women to go to Alaska and develop it, why should we not give them the same right to the minerals in that land that they have in any other part of the United States? If you wish to reserve all the minerals in all of the United States introduce a bill to that effect and refer it to the committee and let the committee consider it. I do not think it is right to make fish of one and fowl of another. I do not think the pending amendment is a good amendment. I do not think it ought to pass, and I would request Members of the House to do justice to Alaska and not to try to tie up the resources of that country any more than they have been tied up.

The bill as reported from the committee without amendment is a bill that ought to pass this House if you wish to do anything for the settlement of Alaska. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills of the following titles:

H. R. 6152. An act to authorize the construction of drawless bridges across a certain portion of the Charles River, in the State of Massachusetts; and

H. R. 8477. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Choctawhatchee River near Caryville, Fla.

AGRICULTURAL ENTRIES ON COAL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. PARRISH rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is recognized. Without objection, the pro forma amendment striking out the last word will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I have listened carefully to the argument of the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY], a member of the committee and the chairman of the committee, in answering some of the contentions that have been made with reference to the pending bill. I am willing to concede that the gentlemen who have charge of this measure come from sections of the country which give them an intimate knowledge of this problem. But that was true years ago when they had charge of legislation under which abuses cropped out and scandals followed. The legislation in those days was conducted through this House by people who were supposed to have an intimate knowledge of the problems involved.

Here is a bill to permit agricultural entry of coal lands, and I think anybody who will give any consideration to the question at all will admit that that vast Territory of Alaska is not going to be developed by entrymen upon coal lands for agricultural purposes.

The chief value of that Territory is its natural resources, its minerals and metals, its coal and oil, and the Geological Survey has made the statement that Alaska is one of the richest sections of any country in the world for some of the rare metals and some of the rare minerals. Talk about protecting the man who takes title! Why, the only people whom it is pretended that it will now protect are some 40 or 50 settlers down in the vicinity of Cook Inlet in the glacial section of the Territory.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the gentleman will allow me, he is mistaken about that.

Mr. WALSH. That was the statement of the gentleman on the floor here.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The gentleman's statement is an exaggeration of anything that I said.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has not yet stated where else it is that there are any settlers waiting to enter upon coal lands. He described the scenic beauties along this 400-mile $56,000,000 railway and the beautiful valleys it went through. Whom are the settlers going to feed with the agricultural products that are raised in that fertile soil? Are their products going to be shipped to the United States, thousands of miles away?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the gentleman will yield, I will answer that question.

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They are going to supply the oil operators and the miners, as they have, and the agricultural resources of that Territory will be developed just exactly as the agricultural resources of California, Oregon, and other Western States have been developed, by the sale of produce to the mining population.

Mr. WALSH. There are 55,000 people in the Territory of Alaska, and the gentleman refers to the great market for these agricultural products that will be raised in these beautiful, rich, fertile valleys. If Alaska is to be developed, it will be developed by people who are going in there to get out of its soil the great deposits of minerals and metals, the coal and the oil. We might just as well make up our minds to that now. It will not be developed by people who will go there to plant wheat and corn and other agricultural products, because they can not send them to the markets of the United States, and the people who are there will take a very small amount, because it will take a very small crop to furnish them with the necessary agricultural products to supply the demands of the local market.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Do I understand the gentleman's position to be that we ought to allow the homesteading of lands of this kind without any reservation at all?

Mr. WALSH. That is not my position. My position is that in allowing these agricultural entries upon these coal lands we should specify the areas and the sections of Alaska where they should be permitted, and we ought not to pass a law so broad in its scope as to take in the entire Territory of Alaska in order to accommodate the relatively small number of people who want to go upon these lands now and who later will say they never knew that there were rich mineral or metal deposits in those lands, and who when those deposits are discovered will be in a position to claim them as their own. Nothing will be lost by being a little careful in safeguarding this measure. We are not going to retard the development of Alaska. We have owned it for years, and the chief development that has come came in consequence of the discovery of gold up in that region.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey: Page 2, line 6, after the word "that," strike out the remainder of the paragraph and insert the following:

"The patent shall in all instances contain a reservation to the United States of all coal, oil, gas, and other minerals, and of the right to prospect for and remove the same."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that that is not a substitute, and the further point of order that it is not germane to the language proposed to be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order on the ground that it is not a substitute.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It covers exactly the same thing as the other amendment covers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will direct the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] provides for the insertion of words in various places in the section.

Mr. JONES of Texas. But only the places in this paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. No; the amendment inserts words in three different places not affected by the gentleman's amendment. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas as read from the Clerk's desk does not provide that in lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey the following shall be substituted, but it merely provides as a substitute to strike out the proviso found on page 2.

Mr. JONES of Texas. To strike out the proviso and insert the same words and put them in the same paragraph and accomplish the same purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair directs the attention of the gentleman from Texas to the fact that if the committee should vote up his substitute there would still be pending before the committee all the various amendments save one proposed by the gentleman from New Jersey. His amendment may be a substitute to the paragraph sought to be stricken out but not to the various proposals of the gentleman from New Jersey embodied in his amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will ask the Chair to recognize me in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. I understand that the substitute is out of the way.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order has been sustained.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The substitute is out of the way, at least for the time being.

Mr. Clairman, I want to speak in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER]. To me it is a remarkable thing that it should be contended that we should not reserve to the United States Government the minerals in the lands simply because the minerals are not known to exist. For the last two or three years in every instance where this House has authorized the disposition of lands in the United States it has reserved the oil, gas, and other mineral rights.

Mr. SINNOTT. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Perhaps not in every instance, but in every instance which has come to my attention, and I know several other Members have watched for these bills. I have offered amendments to 8 or 10 bills and the House has always accepted them reserving in every instance the rights to gas and minerals where they are not known to exist, but, of course, may be discovered later.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The reason the reservation is made with reference to coal, oil, and gas in this bill——

Mr. JONES of Texas. I decline to yield for a statement.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will put a direct question——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman must be under the impression that the Government of the United States receives some benefit as a result of the development of the gold and silver resources. Under existing law a portion of the receipts from coal, oil, and gas leases goes into the Treasury, but nothing is received from the proceeds of gold or silver that is mined, and the Government would not be benefited by making any reservation of these minerals as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] so strongly advocates. The Government desires to encourage the development of the precious metals, and not hamper their development which this amendment would do.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, I do not yield for a speech, but only for a question. Probably if we turned it over to the bunch that has been handling it we would not get any benefit from it, but assuredly if the United States Government would reserve all mineral rights in that great, rich country we would get some benefit from it. That would not interfere with the present mining operations. On the other hand, it might save the Government from the manipulation of future fields by a favored few. If my own State had reserved all of the gas, oil, and mineral rights in the land, we would to-day be getting in royalties enough to pay all the expenses of the State government many times over, and at the same time give the driller and the developer the same rights that he now has. The driller or leaseholder must give to the owner of the land where he operates one-eighth royalty and the owner of the wells gets seven-eighths. The Government can retain all of the gas, oil, and mineral rights not only in Alaska but in all the United States and at the same time secure all the development that will be needed. I am not in favor of the United States Government parting with the title to any land without a reservation permanently of all rights in oil, gas, and mineral rights.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will, for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Would the gentleman favor the passage of a law which would provide that the development of the gold and silver resources of the country should contribute to the support of the Government, as is the case with coal, oil, and gas development?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am not going into that phase of the situation. There are many instances in which, I think, improvement might be made, but I am trying to discuss the issue. Regardless of what the present law may be, I am talking about the proposed law, and as to that I am in favor of reserving all the rights that we have. If we do not have any rights, there will be no harm done. If we have no right to the gold and silver mines, there will be no harm done by the reservation.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The people of the United States want the gold and silver resources of the country developed, and lends every possible encouragement to prospectors and miners.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not agree to all this slush about development. I am in favor of conserving the natural resources of the country and not exhausting them. [Applause.] Of course, we want development, but we want it in favor of the whole people, and not for the special benefit of a favored few.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask for four minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his time be extended four minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Now, I would like to say especially with reference to some of these projects that instead of this eternal preachment about development we have a little more discussion as to conservation and an orderly and substantial development with the public rights safeguarded. When you once exhaust the natural resources of a country you are indeed in a pitiable condition.

Mr. CURRY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. For a question.

Mr. CURRY. The Federal Government has no right——

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, I decline to yield; I have only four minutes. I decline to yield for a speech. That is the way this legislation is sought to be put through—ask to yield for a question and then make a speech. Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for anything whatever.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No. I want to be courteous, but I can not yield for a question and have speeches made. Now, what is the proposition? All over this country is to be found land that was deeded by the Government for a song. At the time of the conveyance no oil or minerals were in contemplation. The purchasers had no idea that there was any oil in those lands. And yet some of them have become millionaires without any effort on their part. They took the lands for agricultural or speculative purposes, and these millions that they have realized ought to belong to the Commonwealth and not to the individual. If these people go on the land for agricultural purposes, take up the land for the purpose of tilling the soil, or if the land is held simply for speculation, they ought not to have the mineral rights.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No; I can not. If they go out there to till the soil for agricultural or speculative purposes, the millions under the ground should not of right belong to those men. It would not be so bad if the actual homesteader were to profit, but I fear the big companies will arrange through dummies to get hold of these rich properties.

Mr. SINNOTT. It does not under the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, the gentleman says it does not. He has got the word "known" in the first part of the bill. It does not belong to him when he goes out there and it is known that the mineral is there, but he may slip out and find out and he knows it is there; but if it is not known generally and officially as classified land that there is gold there or minerals there, he gets full and final title to it.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, no; I am not. I talked with a Member who is familiar with it, and he tells me, and I do not think anyone who reads the bill can escape the conclusion, that if the man files on the land and he does not know that the minerals, gas, or oil, or gold is there, under this bill, if it becomes a law, he would have title to all the oil, gas, and coal, and minerals.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has again expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks for one minute more. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. I object. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will yield me a few minutes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I insist upon my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Oregon that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARRISH) there were—ayes 35, noes 13.

So the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER], to which a point of order was reserved by the gentleman from Oregon. Does the gentleman from Oregon withdraw his point of order or make it?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New Jersey.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. PARKER of New Jersey) there were—ayes 15, noes 24.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 2, line 5, after the word "act," strike out all of the proviso and insert the following:

"Provided, The patent shall in all instances contain a reservation to the United States of all coal, oil, and gas, together with the right to prospect for and remove the same."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. JONES of Texas) there were—ayes 18, noes 33.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That upon satisfactory proof of full compliance with the provisions of the laws under which the entry is made and of this act the entryman shall be entitled to a patent to the lands entered by him, which patent shall contain a reservation to the United States of all the coal, oil, or gas in the land so patented, together with the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same. The coal, oil, or gas deposits so reserved shall be subject to disposal by the United States in accordance with the provisions of the laws applicable to coal, oil, or gas deposits or coal, oil, or gas lands in Alaska in force at the time of such disposal. Any person qualified to acquire coal, oil, or gas deposits, or the right to mine and remove the coal or to drill for and remove the oil or gas under said laws as applicable to Alaska, shall have the right at all times to enter upon the lands entered or patented, as provided by the provisions of this act, for the purpose of prospecting for coal, oil, or gas therein, upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of a bond or undertaking to be filed with him as security for the payment of all damages to the crops and improvements on such lands by reason of such prospecting. Any person who has acquired from the United States the coal, oil, or gas deposits in any such land, or the right to mine, drill for, or remove the same, may reenter and occupy so much of the surface thereof as may be required for all purposes reasonably incident to the mining and removal of the coal, oil, or gas therefrom, and mine and remove the coal or drill for and remove the oil or gas upon payment of the damages caused thereby to the owner thereof, or upon giving a good and sufficient bond or undertaking in an action instituted in any competent court to ascertain and fix said damages: Provided, That the owner under such limited patent shall have the right to mine the coal for use on the land for domestic purposes at any time prior to the disposal by the United States of the coal deposits: Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the exploration upon or entry of any coal deposits withdrawn from such exploration and purchase: And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be held or construed to authorize the entry or disposition of withdrawn or classified coal lands or lands valuable for coal, oil, or gas under section 2306, United States Revised Statutes, or acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, commonly known as soldiers' homestead law.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee his understanding with respect to this law. I am trying to understand it and see what it does really mean. On page 2, line 5, there is a proviso:

Provided, however, That should it be discovered that any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

It is there provided that before the issuance of final certificate if it be discovered that coal, oil, or gas exists on the land there shall be a reservation, and that would imply that unless it is discovered at the time of issuance of final certificate there would not be a reservation even for coal, oil, or gas. Does the chairman interpret this law to mean that in any event there will be a reservation in favor of the Government for coal, oil, and gas?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; it is this, and the committee should keep this thing clear in its mind: This is not a homestead law; this bill is not making a homestead law for Alaska. There is already a homestead law which applies to Alaska. This act merely permits a surface entry upon these coal lands, these lands that are classified as coal lands. Keep in mind that separate and distinct and apart from this bill there is at present a law giving homestead rights in Alaska, but that law does not permit one to make a surface entry upon coal lands. The object of the provision that the gentleman calls to my attention is this: Under the present homestead law in Alaska if at any time prior to final proof coal is discovered upon the land the man's title falls, he loses all rights that he had by virtue of his former entry, by virtue of his 5-year residence upon this land, and this provision, therefore, steps in and protects that homesteader under the present law. That is the object of this provision.

Mr. PARRISH. Then, under paragraph 2, regardless of whether coal, oil, or gas are known to exist on the land, there is going to be in any event a reservation in favor of the United States Government for the coal, oil, or gas upon any land for which a patent is hereafter granted in the Territory of Alaska?

Mr. SINNOTT. Upon any land filed upon under this act.

Mr. PARRISH. Hereafter?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; or heretofore.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. The gentleman means if discovered before complete?

Mr. SINNOTT. No; whether discovered or not, so far as this act is concerned.

Mr. PARRISH. There has been so much doubt about it on this side that I want to have the chairman's understanding of it in the RECORD, so that if the court has to interpret this law at any time it will know what the understanding of the chairman and of the Congress was at the time of its passage.

Mr. SINNOTT. The confusion arises from losing sight of the fact that there is already a homestead law which applies to Alaska.

Mr. PARRISH. I am glad that is the situation. I wish the bill went further and made the reservation of other minerals.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Does the gentleman mean to say that if coal, oil, or gas be discovered on the land after patent is issued and after the time for residing on the land has lapsed it does not belong to the entryman?

Mr. SINNOTT. It does not belong to the entryman under this bill.

Mr. RAKER. It belongs to the Government.

Mr. SINNOTT. It belongs to the Government.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY] a while ago, as I understood him, was justifying the entryman having the title to oil, gas, and mineral rights.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. My mind is not exactly clear on the construction of the language used. I understand what the chairman says about it, but would it not be wise in the enactment of a law so far-reaching as this to strike out the language immediately following the word "discovered," or to strike out the words "prior to the issuance of a final certificate," so that the act would then read:

That should it be discovered at any time on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character, the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

We would then know the meaning of the act, and it would be clear of any ambiguity. Does the gentleman not think it wise to enact legislation in this House which the courts can construe in accordance with what the Members of the House really intended in its enactment?

Mr. SINNOTT. Well, under this provision, the last proviso of section 1, we are merely giving the entrymen a right he has not now. Under the present Alaska homestead law, and, as far as that is concerned, the law obtaining to the United States, if coal is discovered prior to the final proof, he loses all his rights, and this merely permits him to retain the surface entry with the reservation in the United States of the coal, oil, and gas.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Tennessee has expired.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to five minutes in opposition.

Mr. CLOUSE. I move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I think that this bill we now have under consideration is one that deserves the most careful consideration at our hands. I dislike very much to disagree with the committee on a proposition of this sort, but when I have carefully analyzed the language used in this act in connection with the homestead law as it now exists in Alaska, I am constrained to believe that if this act is passed and the rights and privileges given as provided by this act that we have conferred upon every entryman of Alaskan lands an absolute right to the coal, to the gas, to the oil and all minerals that may be found on the land after his patent is perfected. Now, if I can understand the language used——

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. Very gladly.

Mr. SINNOTT. This bill is not the law that confers a homestead right in Alaska. There is an existing statute that gives that right; a statute that has been upon the books for some 20 years. This is separate and apart from that, and there is absolutely no coal, oil, or gas rights conveyed to the entryman by virtue of this bill, except a limited right for domestic purposes.

Mr. CLOUSE. I will ask the chairman of the committee this question: If under the homestead laws of Alaska to-day, when coal, oil, gas, or minerals are found, does not the mineral and oil immediately revert to the United States, whether perfected or otherwise?

Mr. SINNOTT. Under the present law relating to Alaska?

Mr. CLOUSE. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. There may be some question about the effect of the Alaska coal leasing act passed in 1914, and of the oil leasing act of 1920. The departments have not fully agreed upon that, but whether that is true or not, that has nothing to do with this bill.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, that very language, I think, gives the importance to the bill we now have under consideration, the fact that the department is not certain as to the purport and intent of the laws now relating to homestead rights in the Alaskan Territory, but I do know, however, that may be, from a reading of this bill that we find a proviso in section 1, beginning in line 5, page 2, which reads like this:

Provided, however, That should it be discovered at any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the land if coal, oil, or gas in character, the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CLOUSE. In just a moment. What I consider this language to mean is that if the fact is known before the certificate is perfected, then the reservation is made to the Government, but if he initiates his patent——

Mr. SINNOTT. Just a moment; will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLOUSE. And continues to perfect it, and the fact is not known that it contains coal, oil, or minerals, then the reservation of this act does not apply.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. CLOUSE. I am very sorry.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. JONES of Texas. To move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to be captious about this thing, but I have read and reread this, and I think, if I read this language correctly, the gentleman from Tennessee has given the correct interpretation of it. It seems to me that the very first paragraph here, the first part of it, applies to lands that are known to contain workable coal, oil, or gas deposits. That is reserved. Then in the latter part of the same paragraph it is provided:

Any settler who has prior to the passage of this act initiated a homestead claim in good faith on lands containing workable deposits of coal, oil, or gas, or that may be valuable for the coal, oil, or gas contained therein, and not otherwise reserved or withdrawn, may perfect the same under the provisions of the laws under which the claim was initiated, but shall receive the limited patent provided for by this act: Provided, however, That should it be discovered at any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved claims in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character, the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

Now, if the gentleman from Oregon is correct in his construction that it makes no difference whether it was known at the time that the oil, gas, or coal was in the land, why put that proviso on? Why put on a useless thing here?

Mr. SINNOTT. If the gentleman will yield, when a person applies for a homestead entry under this act he will apply under rules and regulations laid down by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. Under a similar act relating to the United States the man in his application shows that he is applying for lands known or classified as coal or oil lands. That is in his application. He would not use this bill to apply for a homestead entry on lands other than some of the 600,000 acres of land that are now classified in Alaska as coal lands.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not know as to that. But here are two classes that are covered. If you read it you can not reach any other conclusion. It is as clear as the English language can make it. There are two classes that come within the purview of the first section of this bill; that is, the first part down to the semicolon, in line 11, applies to lands that are known to contain workable coal, oil, or gas deposits. That is one class. The second part of the paragraph defines another class. That is:

Any settler who has prior to the passage of this act initiated a homestead claim in good faith on lands containing workable deposits of coal, oil, or gas—

That paragraph covers both of those classes. It provides for a reservation in the United States Government of all oil, gas, and coal rights when they come within these classifications. But let us have the classification where the man filed before the coal, oil, or gas was known to be on the land. Or, better still, let us assume he comes within the second classification of paragraph 1—that is, he filed in good faith, except that he did not discover the oil, coal, or gas until after the patent was issued. Of course, it is provided that if he files in good faith and the discovery is made before he secures his patent the reservation shall be put in his patent; but suppose the discovery is made after he gets a full patent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman wants to remember that under this act every patent issued under it contains a reservation. He does not get any patent under this act unless the reservation is inserted therein.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have a great deal of confidence in the judgment of the gentleman, but I am convinced that after this act is passed a man will be able to secure absolute rights in Alaskan lands, in such a way that coal, gas, and other minerals would not be reserved to the United States Government. Now, if the gentleman is right in his construction, why do you object to the last amendment that I offered, which said in so many terms that the patent shall in each instance contain a reservation to the United States of all oil, gas, and coal rights? The first amendment which I offered contained a reservation to the Government of all coal, oil, and other minerals. Practically that same reservation was voted down in the amendment of the gentleman from New Jersey, and in order to obviate that objection, I made the second amendment in so many words what the gentleman construed the proposed law to mean—in other words, I made his declared meaning certain—and yet he lined up his following and voted the proposition down. Now, I believe, as I am standing here, that if a man under this bill files in good faith on this agricultural land and secures his patent and it is later discovered it contains oil, coal, or gas he will have full title to the oil, coal, and gas rights.

Mr. COLTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I will.

Mr. COLTON. I think there will be no objection, if I understand the proposition, to your last amendment, but you sought to strike out a provision that cared for rights initiated prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That would all be covered. I struck out the language the gentleman refers to and simply made it broader, so that it would include all patents covered by this bill, whether contained in the pending proviso or not.

Mr. COLTON. Would not your amendment limit it only to those rights that are initiated?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, no. I put in a proviso which specified that in each instance a reservation of all coal, oil, and gas rights should be made to the United States Government.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. If the gentleman's amendment should be adopted, it would be impossible for an entryman on the public domain to ever get a clear, unvitiated title.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Oh, he would get a clear title to everything except the oil, gas, or mineral rights, and there are many men in the United States accepting title with that reservation. I have frequently offered that reservation upon bills on the floor of this House, and they have been carried. In the fervor of the oil excitement in the United States there has been that reservation, where there were great natural resources that the Government is interested in conserving.

Mr. CLOUSE. If it is the agricultural advantages that are inducing settlers to go to Alaska and settle that Territory, I will ask you if those advantages themselves would not be sufficient under this statute with that proviso stricken out, because they do perfect their title to the surface of the choice agricultural rights?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Most assuredly. They would get all the surface rights. But it seems to me, from the way in which these provisions are being guarded, that there are some people interested in the specific wording of this measure. I fear that under the guise of agricultural settlements some interests will through their employees or through dummies secure control of the vast and rich mineral rights. Who wants to farm amid the ice and snow of Alaska when there are rich undeveloped farm lands in Iowa, Texas, Oklahoma, and, in fact, every State in the Union. The amendment I offer is just as clear as can be, and makes clear just what the gentleman from Oregon says he wants to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, is there an amendment pending?

The CHAIRMAN. There is a pro forma amendment pending.

Mr. SINNOTT. What is the amendment?

Mr. RAKER. There is nothing but a pro forma amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman withdraw his pro forma amendment?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to ask the chairman of the committee to give me a plain answer to the question I am going to ask him. On page 2, line 5, there are these words:

Provided, however, That should it be discovered at any time prior to the issuance of a final certificate on any claim initiated for unreserved lands in Alaska that the lands are coal, oil, or gas in character, the patent issued on such entry shall contain the reservation required by this act.

Now, what becomes of the patent issued when it is not known until after the issuance?

Mr. SINNOTT. When it is not known?

Mr. LAYTON. What becomes of the mineral rights under the patent issued before it is known the mineral rights existed?

Mr. SINNOTT. We are not undertaking in this bill to amend the general laws.

Mr. LAYTON. You think that is provided for?

Mr. SINNOTT. It is already provided for.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Do you not mention in the bill all unreserved lands so as to cover the former entries?

Mr. SINNOTT. Lands taken up at the present time are not reserved.

Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the pro forma amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT] moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken, and the chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey calls for a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 7.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STAFFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 8842) to provide for agricultural entries on coal lands in Alaska, had directed him to report the same back to the House, with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon moves the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas offers a motion to recommit, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. JONES of Texas moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Public Lands with instructions to report the same back to the House forthwith, with the following amendment: Page 2, line 10, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"SECTION 1a. The patent shall in each instance contain a reservation to the United States of all coal, oil, and gas, together with the right to prospect for and remove the same."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] to recommit the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the "noes" seemed to have it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas demands a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 53.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote because it shows there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. Those in favor of the motion to recommit the bill will, when their names are called, answer "yea," those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 78, nays 172, answered "present" 2, not voting 180, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BASKETS FOR FRUITS AND VEGETABLES.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota offers a privileged resolution from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 222.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to consider under the general rules of the House the bill (H. R. 7102) entitled "A bill to fix standards for hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes.

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. Speaker, this rule merely provides for bringing before the House the bill for standard measures of fruits and vegetables. The bill has been carefully considered by the committee and there is ar imperative need for it.

I move the previous question.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, before the gentleman moves the previous question will he yield to me three minutes?

Mr. SCHALL. Gladly.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if I may have the attention of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. VESTAL], this bill is on the Union Calendar. What is the thought of the gentleman about the time for debate on it? Is there any agreement about it between him and other Members?

Mr. VESTAL. I will state to the gentleman from Tennessee that no agreement has been made as to time. I asked the gentleman from California how much time was desired on that side. I hope we may agree upon time for general debate.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. What I wish to know is whether the bill will be reached under the five-minute rule this afternoon?

Mr. VESTAL. I think not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SCHALL] moves the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes on a matter of procedure.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to address the House for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is private calendar day, the Committee on Claims having preference for their legislation. There are a good many bills on the private calendar. I think it would be well if possible to go through the private calendar when we reach it, and with a view to doing that, to give an additional day at this time for the consideration of the private calendar. Should we spend Friday and Saturday on the private calendar, in view of the fact that there are important elections in a number of the States on Tuesday, it is my present purpose, probably this evening or to-morrow, to ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns on Saturday it adjourn to meet on Wednesday next. I shall not make that request if I find on consultation with gentlemen on both sides that the suggestion does not meet with their approval.

I now ask unanimous consent that business on the private calendar may be in order on Saturday, taking up unobjected-to bills. I do not make that request with regard to Friday, because the chairman of the committee is not here, and I should not want to make that request without his approval. I am inclined to think that he will make that request to-morrow when the private calendar is taken up, but I make the request only with regard to the business of Saturday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that on Saturday business on the private calendar be in order, unobjected-to bills to have the preference. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, unless it is going to apply to Friday as well as Saturday I think we ought to go along in the usual way. Last week we used up practically the whole day on one bill, and I think if the gentleman can make the request for Saturday in the absence of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, it can be arranged for Friday as well. I think we will make more headway if we take up the private calendar in that way on both days.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true, and I have advised the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] to make that request to-morrow. I think likely he will do that; but the committee may conclude that on the regular day they should consider the bills in order as they come, and if they do, I am sure the gentleman from Massachusetts will have no objection, because he is always favorable to those measures and helps them along. [Laughter.] I am sure if he makes that request of the chairman of the committee it will be very persuasive, but I do not think he should ask me at this time to make that request with regard to to-morrow's business. I think it should be with regard to Saturday, and I hope the gentleman, who is a friend of the private calendar and of claims bills, will not object.

Mr. WALSH. Unless we are to have the same procedure on both days, I shall object.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will be reasonable about it.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the gentleman whether it is the purpose to consider to-morrow only bills reported from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. MONDELL. I think the chairman of the committee is disposed to consider the bills in their order on the calendar, although the Committee on Claims has the right to demand that bills reported from that committee shall be considered first.

Mr. STAFFORD. To-morrow, of course, preference is given to bills reported from the Committee on Claims?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; but my understanding is that the chairman of the committee does not intend to insist on that preference right.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]?

There was no objection.

BASKETS FOR FRUIT AND VEGETABLES.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the immediate consideration of H. R. 7102. Before that motion is put I want to ask if we may agree upon the time for general debate on this bill.

Mr. BRINSON. What time would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. VESTAL. An hour and a half, half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from North Carolina and half by myself. That would bring it up to 5 o'clock.

Mr. BRINSON. I think we will need more time than that on this side.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I am disposed to think that the opposition wants some time.

The SPEAKER. Gentlemen opposed to the bill are entitled to proper consideration.

Mr. WINGO. I think there is a faint suspicion around here that I am opposed to this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. VESTAL. It is my idea that one-half of the time would be given to those opposed to the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Is there any member of the committee opposed to the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if members of the committee are all in favor of the bill and anyone outside of it demands recognition, he has the prior right.

Mr. VESTAL. No member of the committee, I think, is opposed to the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Let the debate proceed, and the time to be fixed later.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Indiana, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 7102.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LONGWORTH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7102) to fix standards for hampers, round-stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, the bill should be read.

The Clerk read the bill.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, this bill (H. R. 7102) is practically the same bill that was finally recommended by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union in the Sixty-sixth Congress and failed of passage because it was crowded out by other legislation, no vote being taken on it in the House.

The purpose of the bill is to do away with the confusion and deception which now exists in the marketing of fruits and vegetables, due to the great number of different sizes of baskets employed. The bill seeks to accomplish this by standardizing three types of baskets—hampers, round stave baskets, and splint baskets. The bill, if it should become a law, will affect the manufacturers of baskets, the growers who ship their products in them, and the consumer. In the judgment of the committee it will benefit all three.

It will benefit the grower who produces things sold in these containers, for the reason that they may be assured they will not come in competition with a dishonest container and a dishonest statement of what may be a bushel or any other measure in which articles may be sold or placed upon the market. It will be of great benefit to the consumer, because when he buys a bushel of potatoes, apples, or any vegetables sold in baskets he will know he is getting a bushel and will know just how much they are being sold for per bushel and not be deceived by a dishonest measure that may be placed upon the market by some designing person. It will also benefit the manufacturer, for the reason it will reduce the number of forms which it will be necessary for him to keep on hand, and will enable him to extend the territory in which he sells his goods, since all sections using these types of baskets will use the same sizes.

The general principle for standardizing containers for fruits and vegetables is not a new one. We have passed the standard barrel act and the standard container act and provided standards for grape baskets, berry boxes, and other small boxes for fruits and vegetables. To give you an idea of what standardization has already meant in the packages already dealt with in the standard container act: Before that act was passed and went into effect the trade was using a large number of containers of various and deceptive sizes, the purchaser never knowing, when he purchased what he supposed was a quart of berries whether he was actually receiving a quart or less, and the tendency on the part of the unscrupulous dealer was to use berry boxes which would be readily mistaken for a full quart or pint, as the case might be, but which were in reality smaller.

Mr. Chairman, I have some photographs here of the small boxes formerly used in the selling of strawberries and small fruits before the passage of the standard container act. I think the strongest argument in favor of standardizing these baskets is to state what has been accomplished by the passage of the standard container act for small fruit containers. This is a photograph showing the size of small fruit and vegetable baskets in use before the standard container act was passed. Here are a number of baskets that were then used. These baskets [indicating] were all eliminated by the passage of that act save five. These [indicating] are now in use, and the only sizes that are in use. No one of the manufacturers of boxes would under any consideration go back to the old method of manufacturing so many different sizes. These are the only boxes now manufactured for small fruits.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many were there before the passage of the act?

Mr. VESTAL. Thirty-nine, as the hearings showed. Now as to climax grape basket. Here is a photograph showing the number of different sizes of baskets that were used before that act was passed.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How many were there?

Mr. VESTAL. About thirty. By the passage of that act they were standardized eliminating all but three sizes, and there has been no complaint anywhere that I have ever heard of.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Were they all of different sizes?

Mr. VESTAL. No; not all different sizes, but all sorts of sizes, not standard; one would hold a little less than another, or a little more. They were standardized into 2, 4, and 12 quarts.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. And the housewife has got to be a 2, 4, and 12 quart housewife. If she wants to get 10 quarts it would be unlawful for anybody to sell it to her.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Five 2-quart baskets would make 10 quarts.

Mr. WINGO. Yes; but if she wanted 10 quarts she would have to get two 4-quart and one 2-quart.

Mr. VESTAL. In answer to the gentleman I would say this——

Mr. WINGO. That is true, is it not?

Mr. VESTAL. If the housewife desires to buy 10 quarts of berries, she would not be compelled to buy a certain number of boxes to make up the 10 quarts if she desires to carry the berries home in a bag or in a different sort of a box. They could be transferred into those boxes, but it would be unlawful for the seller or the manufacturer to manufacture a different-sized basket for grapes than the ones standardized.

Mr. WINGO. This is true, is it not? If she wanted 10 quarts she could not buy a 10-quart basket in the market to take it home, because it is unlawful to manufacture a container that will take care of her wants. That is true, is it not?

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will permit, as a matter of fact she could buy 10 quarts or 5 quarts or 6½ quarts or any other amount and put them in a bag.

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct.

Mr. WINGO. Oh, yes. She could not have a box that would be full.

Mr. LAYTON. Yes; she could have a box.

Mr. WINGO. She could not have a basket. She has to take a certain kind of basket of a certain size.

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman is absolutely wrong.

Mr. WINGO. If she wants it in a hamper basket, she has to.

Mr. VESTAL. If she buys a basket of grapes put up in these baskets, she knows that she is getting 12 quarts, and when she buys one of these other baskets it may be put up for 12 quarts and contain only 10.

Mr. WINGO. But why should she not be permitted to be able to purchase in 10-quart quantities?

Mr. VESTAL. She can purchase in that quantity.

Mr. WINGO. Why should she not be permitted to find a basket manufactured of a 10-quart size?

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman is getting away from the proposition.

Mr. WINGO. I am getting to it. That is the trouble.

Mr. VESTAL. The purpose of standardizing these baskets is so that these women will not be deceived by having a dishonest basket on the market.

Mr. WINGO. If the basket is correctly marked, that is the point. It is unlawful to sell her a basket marked one thing when it is another.

Mr. LAYTON. But it is being done every day.

Mr. WINGO. Then, why not prosecute those who do it? Will this law be any better than the present law?

Mr. LAYTON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The thing that deceives the women is not the size of the basket, but it is the deceptive practice of misbranding, of false bottoms and things like that.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. As a matter of fact, the evolution of packages leads to the very thing that the gentleman is trying to do here in an unconscious way. Is not that true?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. In the purchase of flour, for instance. Without any law the manufacturer of flour puts it up in bags of so many pounds, and if the housewife wants more flour than there is in one bag, she buys two bags, or if that is not enough she buys three. It is the same way with your grape proposition to-day. Most of the grapes in my State come in a certain uniform package, but that is not the only size there is. They have other sizes. What the gentleman is trying to do is to prevent the manufacture of a fraudulent basket.

Mr. VESTAL. That is exactly it, so that when it goes onto the market the person who purchases it will be sure to get the quantity.

Mr. LAYTON. For instance, you have a seven-eighths bushel basket on the market, and by that the consumer is cheated out of one-eighth of a bushel. In my State we have a five-eighths bushel basket for the sale of tomatoes. Nobody gets cheated there, because if they buy five-eighths of a bushel they get one-eighth of a bushel more than a half bushel; but they are irregular, and that ought not to be. There is just as much necessity for a standard package as there is for a standard dollar or for a standard bushel basket or a standard pound weight. We ought to have standard packages.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I now want to go on with my statement.

The situation prevailing to-day in the case of the containers mentioned in this bill is not different from that which prevailed in the case of smaller packages, and it is to remedy this situation that this legislation is sought to be enacted. The bill will not injure any producer, shipper, manufacturer, or consumer, but it seeks to place upon the market only honest containers for the benefit of all alike.

There are three types of baskets affected by this bill: The hamper, which is especially popular in the Eastern and Southern States, almost 30,000,000 of them being used annually; the round-stave basket, most commonly made in the bushel size and known as the bushel basket, which is popular in practically all sections of the country except in the Southern and Middle Atlantic States and on the Pacific coast, between 18,000,000 and 20,000,000 of these being manufactured annually; the splint baskets, better known to the public as market baskets, which are properly divided into three classes—the overhandle, drop-handle, and square-cornered. I desire to say at this time that none of these baskets are patented and none are patentable, anyone being free to make them without the payment of royalty to any person.

This bill does not provide that fruits and vegetables must be packed and shipped in these types of baskets or in any other, but simply requires that if fruits and vegetables be shipped in this type of container certain standard sizes shall be used. Consequently, the shipment of apples or cranberries in barrels, the shipment of apples or citrus fruits in boxes, and the shipment of any type of fruits or vegetables in crates, boxes, or barrels is not curtailed in any way by this bill. Neither is the manufacture or sale of what is known in the trade as commercial baskets, clothes hampers, lunch hampers, auto baskets, shopping baskets, and various designs of fancy baskets affected in any way.

The sizes which are sought to be standardized by this legislation are as follows: Hampers—8-quart, 16-quart, 20-quart, 1-bushel—32-quart—and two types of 48-quart; the round-stave basket—16-quart, 20-quart, 32-quart, 48-quart, and 62-quart; and splint baskets—4-quart, 8-quart, 12-quart, 16-quart, and 24-quart. The capacities in cubic inches given in the bill are figured on the basis of the proportionate part of the capacity of a barrel. The bill also makes a definite statement as to the capacity of the dry quart, placing it at one thirty-second of a United States standard bushel, or 67.2 cubic inches.

The lack of standardization of baskets gives rise to two abuses, first, the making of a great number of short baskets, and, second, the making of baskets of the same capacity content, in a variety of dimensions. The standardizing of baskets in certain capacities will result in cutting out such abuses as the use of 6 and 7 quart baskets for 8 quarts, the use of 10-quart baskets for 12 quarts; the use of 13, 13½, 14, 14½, and 15 quart baskets for 16 quarts; the use of 27, 27½, 28, 28½, 30, 30½, and 31 quart baskets for 32-quart baskets; and the use of 44, 45, and 46 quart baskets as 48-quart baskets. It will also do away with the 5-peck, or 40-quart, basket which is frequently so made as to be easily mistaken for a 48-quart basket. The use of these short packages was undoubtedly brought about in the first place by the desire of some one shipper to take advantage of his competitors or to endeavor to put something over on the receiver. The two most common short sizes which were developed as a result of this idea were the 14-quart basket to take the place of the 16, and the 28-quart basket to masquerade as a bushel. It is probable that the short one-half bushel was first a 15-quart basket, that it later became a 14½ quart and then a 14 quart. Not satisfied with a cut in capacity of 2 quarts, some one discovered that by making a basket of the same height with practically the same top diameter but with a smaller bottom and with the center hoop drawn in, a basket could be made holding but 13 or 13½ quarts, which would still closely resemble and pass for a 16-quart basket. Much the same thing has happened in the case of the 28-quart basket, and we now find manufacturers advertising 27 and 30 quart baskets and even 29½-quart baskets. There are also on the market other baskets which actually hold about 26, 26½, and 27 quarts.

It developed in the hearings that in certain sections the 14-quart basket was used extensively, and one of the users of the 14-quart basket made objection to it being eliminated by this measure. Finally, after a series of questions as to why the 16-quart basket would not fill all the needs of the 14 quart, he truthfully answered that he could get just as much money for 14 quarts as for 16 quarts. In other words, the consumer was buying the 14-quart basket believing, in a great many instances at least, that he was buying a half bushel.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman speaks of a 14-quart basket. What does it sell for?

Mr. VESTAL. It sells for a package of 16 quarts.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. I was wondering if there is anything in this act that prohibits the manufacturing of these sized baskets where they are properly branded; that is to say, plainly marked showing the contents of the basket.

Mr. VESTAL. That could be done under the pure food and drug act now, but this bill eliminates the baskets entirely, and makes it absolutely unlawful to manufacture a 14-quart basket.

Mr. CLOUSE. Having some of those manufacturers in my district, I am interested. Would it not result in a complete change of machinery that is now being used in the manufacture of just such hampers?

Mr. VESTAL. No; and I shall discuss that in a moment.

Mr. LAYTON. I have a good many of these manufacturers in my district, and every manufacturer on the eastern shore of Maryland and in Delaware is in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. VESTAL. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CLOUSE] will be very much interested in what I am about to say right now. I started out to say that in the hearings in certain sections it was shown that they were using a 14-quart basket very extensively. That section happened to be around Baltimore, Md.

There appeared before the committee two Members of Congress, together with two or three of the men—merchants, or growers or shippers—I do not remember; anyhow, persons interested in the 14-quart basket, and asked that we put into this bill the 14-quart basket. The Members of Congress made speeches and then the committee said they wanted to hear from those men who were using those baskets, and so one gentleman made a speech before the committee insisting that we place in this bill the 14-quart basket. Well, after he had talked a little while I stopped him and asked him this question myself. I said, "My friend, the committee does not want to hurt anybody. We want to get up a bill here that will standardize these baskets so that the public will not be deceived. Will you be frank and tell this committee why you need the 14-quart basket when the bill provides a 16-quart basket," and without any hesitation, and probably without thinking very much, he said, "Why, because I can get just as much money for a 14-quart basket as for a 16-quart basket." That is the whole proposition, gentlemen, in this bill.

That is the whole proposition behind it. We want to try to protect the consumer. I want to say to you that all over the country the manufacturers are not opposed to this bill; they are all for it, except, and I want to be perfectly frank, except some manufacturers in the State of Mississippi, in the State of Alabama, and in the State of Florida. They are opposed to it because we eliminate the seven-eighths bushel basket, and that is the only reason that they are opposed to it. They were represented at the National Basket Manufacturers' Association at Cleveland last year, and all voted for standardization, but they said you ought to let us have our seven-eighths bushel basket. Now, it is not with any personal feeling against anybody in Alabama or in Mississippi or in Florida——

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I will.

Mr. McDUFFIE. The gentleman has eliminated the seven-eighths basket; why not eliminate the five-eighths basket if it is right to eliminate the seven-eighths?

Mr. VESTAL. In just a minute I will answer the gentleman. I will come to it in a minute. I was going to say that our manufacturers of baskets in Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida made that same argument at the meeting of the National Basket Manufacturers' Association. They said that they would be perfectly satisfied to cut out the seven-eighths basket if they would cut out the five-eighths basket, and it showed they really were in favor of standard baskets, but because we had left in the bill the five-eighths basket and eliminated the seven-eighths basket they were opposed to it. Now, the seven-eighths basket is a short-bushel basket. Nobody can contend anything different but that it is a short basket. Nobody can contend but what it masquerades as a bushel. There is not any question about it, and it has become so that three States in the Union have absolutely passed laws prohibiting the seven-eighths basket from coming into those States. Texas is one. Texas will not permit the seven-eighths basket to come into that State. New Jersey is another. Ohio is another. The seven-eighths can not come into these States at all; it is a short basket. Now, as to the five-eighths basket.

The seven-eighths-bushel basket goes on the market. The consumer buys it. The five-eighths-bushel basket does not go into the market for the consumer to buy. It is a field basket, made much stronger than any of these other hampers. They are picking baskets. Nobody can be deceived by a five-eighths basket for a bushel basket. You could not be deceived. Nobody would take a five-eighths-bushel basket for a bushel, and if it were sold as a half bushel the consumer would get the benefit of it. The hearings showed that this five-eighths basket was used as a field basket and did not go into the market and is built much stronger than any of these other hampers for picking use, comes on the market and goes back.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Why could not they use the half-bushel basket for field use as well as the five-eighths?

Mr. VESTAL. Well, answering that question from the hearings——

Mr. McDUFFIE. Is it because they want to give credit for picking half a bushel when they pick five-eighths?

Mr. VESTAL. No; I do not think so.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to answer that question?

Mr. VESTAL. I will yield to the gentleman to answer that question.

Mr. LAYTON. I think I know something about the five-eighths-bushel basket and the reason for it. There is a substantial reason for the five-eighths basket which is dependent upon the evolution in the field picking. A great industry in my State is the tomato industry, as everybody knows in New Jersey and the eastern shore of Maryland. It is found that the five-eighths basket obviates the expense, for instance, of weighing. You put just exactly 60 of the five-eighths baskets piled full upon a picking cart with two horses and it will weigh just a ton, and you do not have to weigh it at all. If the baskets are evenly full 60 baskets make a ton. There is another reason, and that is in the picking and in the handling they have found that the five-eighths basket comes nearer being the maximum amount of fruit that can be put in a basket without crushing. If you go over the five-eighths basket in picking in the field and transporting to the factory you are going to have juice flowing out on account of the superabundant weight, and that is the maximum amount that would go in a basket out of the field without crushing itself by its own weight.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will not the juice flow more freely from a bushel basket?

Mr. LAYTON. Certainly. We do not use them.

Mr. McDUFFIE. You standardize the bushel basket?

Mr. LAYTON. We do not use it in the tomato business.

Mr. VESTAL. Now, gentlemen, I want to show you a photograph here of two hampers, one holding 27 quarts and the other 32 quarts. They are made in such a manner that no one, not even an expert, can tell which is the larger of the two, whether the one on the right or the one on the left. And I have some of the hampers themselves here that I want to show in a moment. Now, here are six types of 28-quart baskets. [Exhibiting]. All of those baskets hold 28 quarts, and these are the different types of 28-quart baskets that are made.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Sold for what?

Mr. VESTAL. They masquerade for a bushel.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Thirty-two quarts?

Mr. VESTAL. Thirty-two quarts. For instance, here is a 32-quart basket and here is a 27-quart basket. [Exhibiting.] They are filled with beans. This represents the pile of beans the consumer loses in buying a 28-quart basket. This basket on the left holds 32 quarts; this one 27 quarts. What Member of Congress could tell the difference in the size of those baskets if they were not marked? And suppose the marking had worn off. Stamps that are placed upon the hampers now are usually placed on the cover, which in most cases is lost, leaving no stamp on the basket at all.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. VESTAL. I will.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the pile of beans outside of that basket represents what the consumer loses who purchases that basket?

Mr. VESTAL. That is correct. Here is another photograph of the 48-quart and the 40-quart hamper [indicating]. This pile of vegetables here shows what the consumer loses in buying a 40-quart basket for a 48-quart basket.

Mr. LAYTON. That is lettuce?

Mr. VESTAL. It is lettuce.

Mr. LAYTON. That difference would ruin a man in a year if he had a large family.

Mr. VESTAL. I brought these photographs over so that you might see exactly what has been going on throughout the United States.

Here is a 13½-quart hamper and a 16-quart hamper [indicating]. They are not marked. Which hamper will the gentleman on this side say is the larger of the two?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. On the right.

Mr. VESTAL. Here is a man who tells me it is on the left. Nobody can tell, unless you have read this line. These baskets appear to be about the same size, but the standard half-bushel hamper on the right holds eight apples more than the 13½-quart hamper on the left. These are apples. What do they sell for? Five cents apiece.

I have here a number of hampers. I will put that hamper up here on the table now. Which one of those hampers would the gentleman say is the larger?

Mr. VESTAL. I simply wanted to show the kind of hampers that are being placed on the market by which the consumer is being deceived every day of the year.

Just a few weeks ago we passed a bill here, a bottle bill, showing that certain kinds of bottles that were manufactured deceived the public. There is just as much reason, and more reason, for passing a bill that will protect the consumer in the buying of fruits and vegetables as in passing the other sort of a measure.

Now, on the table there is a 27, a 28, and a 32 quart basket. Now, then, we propose by this bill to eliminate the short baskets and permit the use of the five sizes heretofore mentioned.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What are the dimensions of that higher one?

Mr. VESTAL. Here is 27 [indicating]. Here is 48. This one is 32.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I understood my friend from Indiana to state that those smaller baskets are sold to represent the same quantity of fruits and vegetables as the 32-quart basket?

Mr. VESTAL. I mean to say that they are sold. I do not mean to make the assertion that the man goes out and sells them and represents them to be 32-quart baskets. But the public is deceived in thinking it is buying a 32-quart basket.

Mr. HUDSPETH. The purchaser believes he is buying a 32-quart basket?

Mr. VESTAL. That is the idea. The bill also provides for the standardization along the line of dimensions as well as the line of capacity.

The hearings brought out the fact that standard bushel hampers have been found varying in height from 17 to 22½ inches. It is obvious, of course, that under such conditions efficient car loading of mixed hampers is impossible.

Section 4 of the bill provides that the Secretary of Agriculture in his regulations shall prescribe certain tolerances as he may find necessary to allow in capacity and specification in order to provide for reasonable variations occurring in the manufacturing and handling of these containers. This section also provides that the manufacturer shall mark the container with its standard capacity content as his guaranty to the purchaser that it is within the limits prescribed in this bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Indiana said in reply to a question of the gentleman from Texas that the public was deceived without actual representation, by those four baskets there, on the assumption, in the case of one holding 27 or 28 quarts, that they were buying 32 quarts of contents?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Why should they assume that?

Mr. VESTAL. Because you do not have a 27-quart basket and a 32-quart basket sitting side by side. Many unscrupulous dealers selling commodities in a basket of that kind do not expressly state that the basket contains a bushel, but when a lady comes in, for example, and says, "I want to buy a bushel of potatoes," or a bushel or pears, or a bushel of this or that, here will be a lot of containers holding 27 quarts or 28 quarts, and the dealer will sell them by the basket and convey the impression to the purchaser that she is buying a bushel. The Bureau of Markets under the Department of Agriculture says that is being done every day all over the country.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. Have they prosecuted anybody for doing it? If the merchants violate the law in doing it, why do they not prosecute them?

Mr. VESTAL. They do not violate any Federal statute.

Mr. WINGO. They violate the statutes of every State in the Union. You can not do it in the District of Columbia. Why does not the Federal bureau prosecute them?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Consider the thousands and even millions of people who have not the money with which to prosecute.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman misunderstood me. I say, Why do not the authorities see to it? You have men whose duty it is to enforce the law. If public officials know it, and it is done every day, as is stated, why do not the Government officials prosecute them?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Great numbers of people do not have the means with which to institute the prosecution.

Mr. WINGO. If anyone sells by false weights in my State he will be prosecuted.

Mr. VESTAL. There is not a man in this House who has done any marketing at all who does not recall that when he has gone to different markets and asked for pears or peaches or baskets of vegetables of some kind or another the merchant or dealer will point to a basket and say, "That basket is so much."

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not think that is a fair illustration, so far as Congressmen are concerned, because none of us can buy that much produce at one time. [Laughter.]

Mr. VESTAL. They make the statement that the basket contains so much. What housewife would know whether the basket contained a bushel or 27 quarts?

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. I am under the impression that the merchant does not represent the basket to contain a bushel of the produce. If the purchaser asks for a bushel of potatoes the dealer says, "I have a basket here that we sell for so much money." He does not make a false representation at all.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. What objection is there to having an honest standard of packages to protect the consumer?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think there is any.

Now, I want to make this statement:

Section 5 was placed in the bill at the urgent request of manufacturers and shippers. It provides that the Secretary of Agriculture, when he finds it necessary, may in his regulations prescribe specifications and tolerances with respect to the strength of the material used or the dimensions thereof, but not departing from the respective capacities herein prescribed, and this is done in order to provide for more economical use of space in packing or transportation. In other words, if the Secretary of Agriculture should find that some manufacturer was putting out a basket that in every way complied with the law as to capacity and dimension but that it was made out of material that was so light and flimsy as not to carry safely the fruits and vegetables packed therein, he would have a right under this section to prescribe specifications to that manufacturer with respect to the strength of the material that should be used in the construction of the baskets, the same to be made effective not earlier than six months after public notice had been given, following an opportunity afforded the interested party to be heard.

Section 6 provides for the prosecution of persons violating this act.

Section 7 provides that baskets, hampers, and so forth, may be proceeded against if they are not within the provisions of the law.

Section 8 permits the manufacture for sale or shipment of baskets different from those mentioned in the act if the same are to be shipped to a foreign country, in accordance with specifications of the foreign consignee or customer, not contrary to the law of such foreign country, and also that the act shall not prevent the manufacture and use of banana hampers of the shape and character now in commercial use for bananas.

The enforcement of the act can be secured most easily by inspecting the containers at the factories where they are made, since this law is desired by the manufacturers and their hearty cooperation in its enforcement may be expected. This has been the case in the enforcement of the standard container act, the barrel act, and so forth.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I want to ask my friend if there is any organization of farmers or consumers that is favoring the measure?

Mr. VESTAL. This bill has had quite a good deal of publicity and——

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. When the hearings were had, when the bill was up at the previous session of Congress, representatives of the farm bureau of the State of New York, and I believe of one other State, appeared and indorsed the bill.

Mr. VESTAL. Yes. The representatives of farm organizations have indorsed the bill. I may say, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS], that there was placed in this bill the provision making it compulsory upon the manufacturer to mark his baskets with their true capacity content. No; not their true capacity content, but their standard capacity content, I should say, so that it can not work a hardship upon any consumer or any shipper or any grower. The burden is all upon the manufacturers, and the manufacturers of the country are all for the bill except as I stated in my remark concerning those in the Southern States. So that if the shipper should sell a basket that is a short basket, all that he has to do is to show that he bought that basket of a certain manufacturer, and the manufacturer is the man who has to suffer. Now, the manufacturers are all for the bill. They want this standardization, and you can see the reason why, because where there are 40 sizes of hampers now this bill cuts the number down to 5. It does away with over 30 forms, and it provides that every State in the Union must use the same sized basket, and the manufacturer in Michigan can sell them in Texas and the manufacturer in Texas can sell them in Maine or anywhere in the United States, so it enlarges their territory for selling the baskets.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I am glad to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. STAFFORD. In those States where by their legislatures they have fixed standard containers, how do the standards prescribed by this act compare with those fixed by the State legislatures?

Mr. VESTAL. I am not able to state that to the gentleman. I have had no representative from any State make any complaint as to this bill.

Mr. MORGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. MORGAN. I wish to state to the gentleman that in Ohio they have a law standardizing measures and that the director of measures in the State of Ohio wrote me a letter indorsing this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. My inquiry was whether in the States where they have legislated on this subject the sizes are the same as those provided in this bill.

Mr. VESTAL. The only States that I know of that have legislated on the sizes of standard containers are the State of Texas and the State of Indiana, which I think last year passed a bill. A bill was introduced in Indiana, and I am not sure whether it was passed or not, following the sizes mentioned in this bill. I understand that Texas passed such a law. I will ask the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRIGGS] if I am right about that.

Mr. BRIGGS. I so understand.

Mr. VESTAL. Texas has passed a law following this bill. Just one other word. The date fixed for the law to become effective is one year from the 1st of November first succeeding the passage of the act. This is done for the reason that the 1st of November, as we were informed by the Bureau of Markets, is as near a between-seasons date as it was possible to find in the basket business. At that time manufacture for the current season has practically stopped, and the demand for containers for southern-grown winter vegetables has not commenced. It is, therefore, a convenient time to have such a law become effective. The manufacturer would make any necessary changes in his machinery between seasons. I desire to say further that the hearings disclosed that the changes required in basket-making machinery will be comparatively inexpensive. In the long run the manufacturer will benefit, because the number of forms which he will be required to keep in stock will be very much smaller, and there will therefore be a saving on this point. [Applause.]

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. Yes.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. What is the necessity for including the provisions of section 9 in this particular act with reference to the metric system?

Mr. VESTAL. I will say to my friend that I do not think there is any particular reason for it. That section has been placed in all of these standardization bills. We have a law upon the statute books permitting the use of the metric system.

Mr. LEATHERWOOD. Would it be possible to use the metric quart under the provisions of this act?

Mr. VESTAL. I do not think so. That is my judgment about it. We have fixed the standard dry quart as the basis of measure.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. VESTAL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman will recall that this was inserted in order not to give the impression that we were cutting out the metric system.

Mr. VESTAL. I think that is true.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Ordinarily the Chair would recognize the ranking member of the committee, but with the understanding that all the members of the committee are in favor of the bill, the Chair recognizes the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], opposing the bill.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LONGWORTH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 7102) to fix standards for hampers, round-stave baskets, and splint baskets for fruits and vegetables, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 215. Joint resolution to declare November 11, 1921, a legal public holiday.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 2447. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Pearl River, between Meeks Ferry and Grigsbys Ferry and between Madison County, Miss., and Rankin County, Miss.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. VESTAL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Friday, November 4, 1921, at 12 o'clock noon.

TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, at yesterday's session, rising to a question of personal privilege, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] requested permission to publish in the RECORD the reproduction of a photograph of a gallows purporting to have been used in the execution of soldiers abroad. In making this request the Senator from Georgia saw fit in his remarks to bring in the Senators from New Jersey and to infer at least that they should familiarize themselves with the situation as presented in a newspaper published in New Jersey. The Senator from Georgia did not request the publication of the article which appears in the same edition of the New Jersey newspaper, but asked only that the photograph of the gallows without further explanation be reproduced.

In order that the facts may be made clear to the country, I have investigated and secured from the War Department the record of executions abroad, but particularly of those two which were described to some extent in the article in the newspaper which the Senator from Georgia failed, as stated, to introduce for publication in the RECORD.

The newspaper is the Passaic Daily Herald, printed at Passaic, N. J., the edition of Wednesday, November 2, 1921. The article goes on to state that these executions were witnessed by various soldiers and occurred at or near Issurtille, France. The records of the War Department show that two executions took place in the vicinity of Issurtille, France. I shall not use the names of the soldiers for obvious reasons. The records disclose that those two soldiers were tried for the crime of murder and attempt to rape; tried before a court-martial in the regular form as provided for by military regulations, the final order of conviction and sentence to be hanged being given in the first case on February 12, 1919, and in the second case on March 27, 1919. The execution took place in the first case on April 4, 1919, and in the second case on April 25, 1919. The first man was a Negro and the second a white man.

Permit me to read again from the article which was not offered for the RECORD by the Senator from Georgia when he offered the accompanying pictures:

> The real story of the crime he committed is probably on file in the records of the War Department—

It is, as I have just stated—

> Perhaps for the sake of his family they never were and never will be known in connection with his name. So far as the enlisted men who saw the hanging were permitted to know, he had committed a criminal assault upon a 7-year-old French girl, who died following the attack.

Does the Senator from Georgia wish to try to justify his charge of the execution of American soldiers without trial by producing a photograph of the gallows on which a brute paid the penalty for assault and murder of a 7-year-old child?

Does the Senator mean to contend that the sentence was unjust?

Somewhere in France, Mr. President, lies all that remains of the soul and body of a 7-year-old child, murdered in the most brutal fashion, and the Senator from Georgia requests that the photograph of the gallows upon which this man paid the penalty for that dastardly crime be reproduced in the RECORD, apparently assuming in some way that that is a justification of the charge he has made that soldiers were executed abroad without trial.

How can we assume anything else?

The history of the case which this newspaper produces is clear, and the records of the War Department are certainly positive and will not be disputed.

The Senator speaks of the honor of the American Army. The honor of the American Army, Mr. President, in my judgment, demands the punishment of those who are guilty of such crimes.

No one has claimed that there were not executions abroad. When this controversy first arose the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] introduced into the RECORD the fact that the War Department records demonstrated that in some 9 or 10 cases, I think it was, soldiers were tried by court-martial, convicted in the regular manner, and were executed abroad.

Mr. President, the issue in this case can not be camouflaged. No one questions that men were tried and convicted and executed for dastardly and brutal crimes abroad; but the Senator from Georgia, in language that is unmistakable, has asserted that men were executed without trial. It is the evidence of that that the American people demand—no more and no less. The pictures of a gallows used to mete punishment to a brute is certainly no justification and no defense for the charge made by the Senator from Georgia.

So long as the Senator has seen fit to bring the Senators from New Jersey into this, I again insist that he owes it to himself, committee or no committee, he owes it to his honorable position as a Senator to produce the evidence. Since he has made these charges he can not justify them with clippings and reproductions such as those offered yesterday. The American people honor their Army; they are proud of their Army; and they will demand by the production of facts that can not be disputed and by competent evidence that can not be controverted to know if it be true or otherwise that men were executed abroad without having a trial by court-martial. Again I repeat that is the issue—no more and no less.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, when the Senator from New Jersey stated that I had assailed the two Senators from his State on yesterday, I was astonished, and I wondered if I had lost my memory. I turned to the official report of what I did say, and I find there is not a word of my remarks that applies to either one of those Senators. Let the Senator look at the RECORD himself. The only time either one of the Senators got into my brief address was when the Senator's colleague [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] sought to interrupt me just at a time when I could not be broken into, and I declined to be interrupted; but, as that seemed to be discourteous, I not only struck it out of the RECORD but I went to the Senator's colleague and tendered to him the apology of a gentleman for having seemed to be rude to him.

If any attack was made upon the Senators from New Jersey it was made in the New Jersey newspapers, and those Senators ought to have answered it at that time, in the paper. I made no attack upon them, and I make none now.

The Senator from New Jersey says there is a little white girl in France whose dust lies beneath the soil, because of the crime of a Negro brute. The picture I presented showed that he was hanged in the uniform of the United States Army. Since when did it become legal to disgrace the uniform by hanging it at the end of a halter on a gallows? Do not hide behind "the honor of the Army," as the French did in the Dreyfus case. I have not attacked the Army. I have said that two or three times, and I repeat it. Having in my possession the evidence I had, I would have been recreant to my sense of duty, to my country, and to the Army if I had not brought it to the attention of the Senate, to the attention of the Army, and to the attention of the country, in order that these abuses might be removed from the service.

The little white girl lies beneath the soil of France because of the crime of a Negro brute. How many little white girls in Dixie land lie beneath the soil because of the crimes of Negro brutes? I challenge you to talk about that. This Negro man who was hanged in the uniform of the United States Army was not hanged because of the uncontrollable excitement of those who saw a white girl, lying pallid in death, bleeding, with her throat cut, and her eyes, with a look of unutterable horror, gazing toward the heavens which had no relief for her. We have seen that in the South. Let the Senator remember that the next time he talks about the little French girls. We love our white girls quite as much as the French love theirs.

Mr. President, there is a strange discrepancy in the statements that are being made about these hangings in France. Whoever knew that there were any hangings in France, so far as the official reports went? Nobody knew it. The casualty lists came out, showing so many killed, so many badly wounded, so many slightly wounded, so many sick, so many missing, so many deserters, and so many "dead from other causes"—what other causes? Nobody ever explained. It is now being explained. They were shot or they were hanged; and the Senator from New Jersey, who has now twice taken his feet and spoken so eloquently about these hangings, did not mention the case where the officer had a soldier's heart penetrated with a bayonet, and the facts are not those which his colleague supposes them to be. I have a constituent in Georgia who saw that bloody murder; that foul, atrocious crime, than which no German ever committed a greater atrocity, and I will have that affidavit here as soon as it can be made and sent.

The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] said, holding up his hands, "I can count on the fingers of one hand the number of American soldiers executed in France." Did he not say that? Is it not in the RECORD? I do not doubt that he believed just what he said. It is not my purpose to impugn the honor or the motives of any of my colleagues on this floor. I have not intentionally done so; and if I should do so, I would apologize like a gentleman as publicly as I gave the affront.

The very next morning after the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs said that there were 5 such executions, the Secretary of War stated that there were 10. Who was right? Who knew most about it? The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] is a stickler for accuracy; that is a favorite word of his, and it is a very good word, too, in dealing with facts—"accuracy."

Now, who was accurate, himself or the Secretary of War? He said "5"; the Secretary said "10." Who was accurate?

In the New York Herald of yesterday appears a statement from ex-Secretary of War Newton D. Baker. Little "Newt" had to get in. Poor little Newt! Poor little Newt had to get in. Poor little Newt! It seems that we are all going to get in before we quit, if they do not pull us into some committee room and lock the doors. The statement of the ex-Secretary of War is in a box, as we journalists call it; they put it in a box. Of course, nobody could put Newt in a box. I am going to make a feeble effort to do it; but I have no idea that I can squeeze him into it; no box would be small enough to hold him. The statement is dated, "Cleveland, November 2," and says:

Charges of Senator THOMAS WATSON that American soldiers in France were hanged without trial and were subjected to barbarous treatment were declared to be preposterous and incredible by Newton D. Baker, former Secretary of War, to-night. France was not a howling wilderness, but a civilized country—

Yes; very civilized! She charged us for the very roadbed upon which our boys built the iron highways that carried our soldiers to her salvation. That is civilization! She charged us for the very trenches upon which they stood knee-deep in mud and water to fight her battles; and yet she is civilized! Her citizens charged them for the playgrounds upon which, on Sunday, they played baseball or tennis or golf. Oh, yes; France was not a howling wilderness, but a civilized country, from which Lafayette came, upon a written contract made with Silas Dean, pledging this country to make him a major general before he would leave France and come to America; and he did not have sense enough to drill a company of soldiers, besides which he sniffled. Some of these days when somebody gets up here and blows off about Lafayette, I mean to take him down a peg or two. I know Lafayette, and Washington knew him, and it was not Washington who had him released from that Austrian prison into which he was put when the French Army chased him with the intent to kill him. It was Napoleon Bonaparte, in the treaty of Campo-Formio. Yes; I know Lafayette. He betrayed every French Government that trusted him; and the only independent command he ever had in America came very near getting bagged by Benedict Arnold; and it was only the James River that saved Lafayette and his command from being captured.

Let us continue with little Newt. Mr. Baker says:

It was pretty well crowded with American men and women—

That is, France—

It was pretty well crowded with American men and women, who would have been quick to report anything of this kind.

Report to whom? What gantlet would that report have had to run? What officers would have allowed that report to come to this country?

If any report of that sort had been made, Mr. President, everyone here knows that it would have been stopped by the first officer, and the writer of it would have been punished. Talk about barbed-wire entanglements! No letter of that sort could have gotten through them to this country.

Now, listen. Here is little Newt, who was Secretary of War:

If a single American soldier had been hanged without trial, word of it would have come to this country and proper measures would have been taken. The Senator's entire charges are preposterous and incredible.

Mr. President, substantially the same charge was made here upon the floor of the Senate on December 30, 1918, by Senator Chamberlain, and nobody answered it. Nobody denied what he said. What did he say? Senators can refer to the RECORD. I will not weary them.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. Chamberlain, who was then Senator from Oregon, never charged, did he, that soldiers were hanged or executed without court-martial? I know that Senator Chamberlain was quite severe in some of his criticisms of some of the operations of the War Department, and he made some criticisms with which I did not at all agree; but I am quite a warm friend of Mr. Chamberlain, and I do not like even by inference to have it go out that he made a charge that soldiers were hung or otherwise executed without trial of any kind whatever. The Senator does not charge that Mr. Chamberlain made that statement, does he?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the RECORD will show that I made it a point to state that the one thing that the Senator from Oregon did not know was that soldiers had been hanged. That is in the RECORD.

Mr. MYERS. If the Senator will pardon me, I was not present when the Senator said that.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Wait a minute, now, and then I will yield to the Senator with great pleasure. I did state this, and there is the RECORD; the Senator can see it:

Mr. Chamberlain stated here on the floor that the officers would set aside the findings of courts-martial and would tell them to inflict a more severe penalty, and under his orders to those young lieutenants of the courts-martial men were given 15 years, 20 years, 25 years in the penitentiary for a trivial offense. There it is in the RECORD.

Are there any other questions?

Mr. MYERS. No; none other at present. I know that Senator Chamberlain made some of those charges, but I did not want it to go out by inference or implication, or even a misunderstanding of the Senator's remarks, that Senator Chamberlain had ever charged that men were executed without trial. If the Senator stated on another day that Senator Chamberlain never made that charge, if he exculpated him from making that charge, I was not present when he made that statement and did not hear it. I am glad the Senator says that he does not charge Senator Chamberlain with making that charge.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I am glad to state again, and the Senator will find the statement in the RECORD, that the one thing that even the Senator from Oregon, with all of his research and investigation and inquiry at the War Department, which was then under Newton D. Baker, did not seem to know was that our soldiers were being hanged in France.

Yesterday, Mr. President, while we were in session a card came from the reception room, and I went out to meet a young man who seemed to be very much of a gentleman. He had the manners of one. He wore the dress of one. He spoke the speech of an educated man. He gave me a photograph of a gallows at a different place, upon which he himself had seen two men hanged. I gave the photograph to Mr. Bart Campbell, who requested it, and when I asked him for it this morning he said it was on its way back from New York, where it had been used for journalistic purposes and will appear in the papers in due course; but, fortunately, there came to me this morning by mail a copy of another one. There it is.

A certain magazine—which I will not name at present, because it might be debarred from the mails, as was mine, destroying 11 years of hard work and $75,000 of my property, debarred by an autocratic order from the Post Office Department here when it was being run by A. S. Burleson—pretends to quote from an official order of an officer. Now, listen. This has gone to all the world. Let him deny it who can. The officer says:

> I am informed that the Red Cross built a gallows for the A. E. F. to hang their criminals on. Will you kindly at once take all records of this transaction from your files and see that they are burned; also break up the gallows, so that there is nothing left of them. The salvage section will keep no records of them. Be absolutely certain that there are no records, photographs, or other papers extant in regard to this transaction. We wish it entirely wiped off the books.

It was wiped off the books.

Yesterday, Mr. President, I stated that the young man who slipped in there and took a snapshot of that gallows before it could be destroyed was on his way here. He told me over the long-distance telephone that he was on his way here. Therefore I made my statement in good faith. This morning I received this telegram from him:

> Dead broke. Owe money. Now, could not testify to anything except—

Here is a man who served under your flag and in your Army four years and has an honorable discharge. He is an ex-service man. He is dead broke. How many ex-service men are dead broke?

Let me recapitulate a little before I read this telegram in full. A few days ago the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] renewed the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] for adjusted compensation for these men who are dead broke and out of employment, as this boy is.

On that motion I made a speech in support of it, as I did on that of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER]. In that speech I endeavored to point out the extraordinary claims which those men had on the Government. Then came the attack upon me by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. Then came the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which reads as follows:

> I move that the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to invite the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] to appear before it and to investigate the charges he makes.

An invitation implies that it may be declined. The Senator for the moment may have forgotten what I know he is familiar with, this clause of our supreme law, that a Senator "shall in all cases, except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and for any speech or debate in either House they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator observes the language "any other place." The Senator certainly does not contend that a Senator upon this floor can not be questioned concerning a speech which he makes here.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Right here he can, but not in any other place; and a committee room is some other place.

Mr. LENROOT. That matter will be determined, no doubt, later on.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. It certainly will. I know what you think you are going to bring me up against. You have made a good many mistakes; you can make some more, if you want to. You have the attention of the country at last, and when you try to do unto me what the John Adams Congress did to Matthew Lyon, of Vermont, your administration will do just what John Adams's administration did, it will go out of the White House by an overwhelming condemnation of the voters of this country.

Let me resume the reading of the telegram:

> Dead broke. Owe money. Now, could not testify to anything except that saw scaffold at Gievres and informed by scaffold guard that 21 soldiers already hung and many more to be hanged.

That is the number I stated. That boy's statement to me, repeated in this telegram, was my authority for having made it. I will send him the money to come here, and he will face you as fearlessly as he faced the Germans in France, and if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] wants to ask him some questions, he can do so.

I have already alluded to the conflict between the statement of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] and the Secretary of War [Mr. WEEKS]. In yesterday evening's Star there is a statement from another official, Capt. W. M. Larner, Quartermaster Corps, Fort Thomas, Ky., who was camp quartermaster at Gievres, and Capt. Larner says only one man was hanged.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At Gievres?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. At Gievres.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; only one.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. This ex-soldier, who had no motive on earth to tell a falsehood in that telegram, or to me at my house, said the guard told him that 21 had already been hanged, and many more were waiting to be hanged. Who was the guard? The records ought to show. They are accessible to the Senator from New York as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. Will he inspect those records? Will he give us the name of that gallows guard? Will he have him come here?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator put the question to me now for an answer?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia the other day indicated very clearly to the Senate that he could not trust the Senator from New York to make a fair investigation of this matter, nor the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate. Therefore the Senate has appointed a special committee to investigate the matter of the execution of soldiers without court-martial. I have no doubt whatsoever, although I am not authorized to speak for the committee, that the committee will endeavor to find out the source of the information given by the soldier to whom the Senator has referred. That is why the committee was appointed, to find out the truth of this matter, and if I can aid them in finding the truth, I shall be more than glad.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, what I said, and what the RECORD will show I said, was, that I would not go before the Senator's committee. The grand jury which accuses does not try the accused. The Senator accused me, and I naturally refused to go before his committee and face the accuser, and expect an unbiased trial; and I may say here now, I am not going to answer before any committee for anything I said here on this floor in the debate. The Constitution guarantees me that right, and if I were to abdicate that right, or basely surrender it, the very women in Georgia would beat me with their house brooms for cowardice, when I return to Georgia. Expel me if you will. You can do it. You have the votes. Go ahead and do it.

Is the Republican majority scared? Why not debate the thing here in the open, where the charges were made? Why not meet me face to face, where the whole country, in practice and in fact, is hearing? Why not meet me face to face here? Why try to trap me and cage me and silence me in a committee room? If there is anything on earth cheaper in America than human life, it is the whitewash report of a committee. Nobody reads committee reports. Nobody has any confidence in them.

Mr. President, I read a committee report before being elected to the Senate. It was a coal investigation, after the troops had been called out by Gov. Sproul of Pennsylvania. Soldiers had ridden down men, women, and children with cavalry horses, and shot into their houses; and one member of that committee, after having heard that a steel-jacket bullet went through one side of a laborer's cabin, crashed through the little cheap stove, and buried itself in the wall beyond, naively asked, "Do you think a bullet could do all that?" Mr. President, he did not seem to know that a steel-jacketed bullet is warranted to pierce 2 inches of solid steel.

What is the matter with the General Staff? Is it frightened? Does it want to hide in the committee room? Why not give the facts to some Senator, and let the Senator face me here on the floor, and face others who are going to support me here on the floor? You need not think for a moment that I stand alone, nor need you doubt that I realize what I am up against when I fight this military clique which wants to Prussianize our country with compulsory universal military service. Why not have a public and speedy trial, as the Constitution guarantees? Virtually, now, this case has assumed the aspect of an indictment against me. Mr. President, I am against the policy of the General Staff, which wants to put over on our people universal compulsory military training. Militarism does not teach men to think; it teaches them to obey. The Great Spirit that gave us our minds to think with occasionally puts great thoughts into those minds, and democracy dies when men cease to think.

No captive of Prussian militarism ever wrote a line that lived or spoke a word that burned. It takes free men to do that, and they have been doing it ever since the days of Plato. The hemlock was never distilled that could put into eternal sleep the thoughts of Socrates; and Cicero, not in the Roman Forum, but in all other forums, is still thundering against wrong, because his spoken word has never died.

Have I committed a misdeed in the Senate or elsewhere? If so, try me for it, convict me, expel me. If I only dare to speak my honest convictions, and can base them on facts, respect those facts, if you do not respect the speaker.

Is it a crime to criticize the General Staff, or the officers of the Army? It is no crime to criticize the President. It is no crime for him to criticize the Senate. Presidents have often done so. We have often criticized the President. We have now reached the point which militarism reached in Germany. There no civilian could criticize the army. It was a crime to do so. Even in the Reichstag a member did not dare speak against a measure if the chancellor said "The Kaiser wants this passed." Have we reached that point? If so, tell the people.

Now, Mr. President, with that overture I come to the production of further evidence fresh from the mails, the sacred United States mails, just as sacred as the United States Army.

November 3, 1921—

As usual, addressed to myself—

You contend that you have a photo of a gallows used in France, but if you will call on me I shall gladly loan you two photos of the deed being done at Issurtille, France. Should you be interested in obtaining these and will call on me—

Giving the street number—

I shall be glad to cooperate with you. Respectfully—

That letter comes from Anacostia. There is no request for secrecy, so I give the name—Johnson M. Fitts.

Here is a letter, Mr. President, with the Red Cross on top of it, and the writer says that he saw a boy hanged at still another place, Boucille, not Issurtille, nor Gievres, nor the place on the Meuse alluded to by the New Jersey paper. We have long since passed the number of fingers on the one hand of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. We are now passing the figures of Secretary Weeks. We will soon reach the figures that I gave if we do not go beyond them. The name of this writer is Ernest M. Jeffery, Great Lakes, Ill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. For a question; yes.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a question I am going to ask. It is a mere matter of order of business. We have the morning hour, and a great many Senators have morning business which has collected.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. LODGE. Then the Senator forces me to demand the regular order.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. You can demand it if you are afraid of what I am going to read.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the Senator reading anything. I say with hesitation——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. No; you do not want to get the information.

Mr. LODGE. I think other Senators also have rights.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. The Senator from Massachusetts does not want the Senate to get the facts as I am giving them. That is all there is to it.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator forces me to do it, I ask for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts demands the regular order. The regular order is the presentation of petitions and memorials.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I present a resolution in the nature of a petition from the First Baptist Church of Washington, D. C., Dr. Henry Allen Tupper, pastor, asking that each session of the disarmament conference be opened with prayer. There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The First Baptist Church, Sixteenth and O Streets NW., Washington, D. C., Dr. Henry Allen Tupper, pastor, unanimously passed the following resolution at a regular meeting of the church on the evening of October 30, 1921:

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, from the Committee on Printing I report without amendment the following Senate joint resolution and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the joint resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 132), as follows:

"That hereafter no journal, magazine, periodical, or similar Government publication shall be published, issued, or discontinued by any branch or officer of the Government service unless the same shall have been authorized under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Joint Committee on Printing, and such publication shall not contain any commercial advertisements."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. KING. May I inquire whether it is a unanimous report?

Mr. MOSES. It is a unanimous report of all the members of the committee who were in town. Two of the members of the committee were not in town.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATION OF TREATMENT OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I have just read the resolution of inquiry with reference to the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], as contained in the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]. It reads as follows:

Mr. President, I move that the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to invite the Senator from Georgia to appear before them and to investigate the charges which he makes.

In that form the motion might be construed as meaning an investigation of the accuser as well as the accused. I therefore wish to move to amend the resolution or motion so that it shall read:

That the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is not now before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am asking unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] demanded the regular order.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not ask for the regular order. On the contrary, I hope the request of the Senator from North Carolina will be acceded to.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is impossible for the Chair to lay the resolution before the Senate for amendment until it is brought before the Senate by motion.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution in question has just been reported. Under the rule, of course, it would have to go over one day, but by unanimous consent, which the Senator from North Carolina asks, the resolution just reported can be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina, as the Chair now understands it, asks unanimous consent that the resolution be laid before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I make that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senate has under consideration Senate resolution 165.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina to look at the vote of the Senate at the bottom of page 7174.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not have it before me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have it here, and will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. Read it. What is it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just read that.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; that is what the Senator from North Carolina just read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. There is now before the Senate the resolution authorizing the special committee to conduct the investigation. I wish to suggest to the Senator that while I have no objection to the amendment which he suggests to the resolution, yet what about the vote of the Senate, which still stands, even if we should amend the resolution?

Mr. HEFLIN. We can reconsider the motion and then amend it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Would not the Senate have in some way to reconsider the action of the Senate taken in adopting the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which is as follows:

I move that the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to invite the Senator from Georgia to appear before them and to investigate the charges which he makes.

Would we not have to reconsider that vote?

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, the colloquy between Senators in the center of the Chamber may be instructive to Senators who sit there, but we at the end of the aisle can hear nothing and know nothing of the matter that is being discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The request of the Senator from Illinois is that those Senators engaged in the discussion speak so that they may be heard throughout the Chamber.

Mr. SIMMONS. What the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] suggests is exactly what I did. I asked unanimous consent for the reconsideration of the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which I read, and then I moved that it be amended so as to read as I stated.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator did that, that is what I think should be done.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what I did.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thought the Senator merely offered an amendment to the motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I did not.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator was going to offer the amendment when the vote had been reconsidered.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina asks unanimous consent that the vote by which the motion was adopted may be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The Senator from North Carolina now offers an amendment to the motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move that the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. In order to avoid the question of the reappointment of the committee, will not the Senator merely move to amend the motion by striking out the part in reference to the invitation, and then allow the remainder to stand?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will do that, Mr. President. That will reach the same point. I move, then, to strike out of the original motion the words "to invite the Senator from Georgia to appear before them and"; after the words "investigate the charges" to strike out "which he makes" and in lieu to insert the words "made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina to the motion.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the motion be stated to the Senate as it would read as proposed to be modified if the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina were adopted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can state to the Senator from Connecticut how it will then read, and then we can determine if we have got it right.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. As proposed to be amended the motion would read:

That the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. McCUMBER. What charges? The motion does not mention them.

Mr. SIMMONS. The charges are not specified in the original motion, except by the statement "the charges which he makes."

Mr. LENROOT. They were specified in the debate, which just preceded, and they were stated.

Mr. SIMMONS. They were stated. I am simply modifying the motion as it appears in the RECORD. Now, will the Secretary state the motion as it would read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the motion as amended.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to modify the motion so that it will read as follows:

That the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator from North Carolina what he means by that language? Does he mean that the committee shall investigate the charges made theretofore, or charges made theretofore and also charges subsequently made and to be made? I should like to know what the motion includes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will state to the Senator from Ohio that the motion was made in the midst of a debate in the Senate growing out of certain charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made a motion, and in that motion he simply referred to "the charges." I am merely proposing to amend that motion as it appears in the RECORD, adopting the same language which the Senator from Wisconsin used and which has its explanation in the context that accompanies it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, as the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], who is a member of the committee, has suggested, the charges to be investigated, of course, ought to be definitely understood, because the form of the motion will affect the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS rose.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Senator will pardon me a moment until I complete my thought.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does the Senator understand that under the language of his amendment to the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] which was adopted by the Senate on November 1 the charges referred to in that motion, if adopted by the Senate as the Senator wishes to have it modified, are the charges which were made by the Senator from Georgia at the time the Lenroot motion was adopted by the Senate?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is exactly what it refers to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Very well.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES of Washington. As I understand, the matter before the Senate now is the original motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Is it too late now to demand that that motion shall be reduced to writing?

Mr. SIMMONS. It has been reduced to writing.

Mr. LODGE. And it has been printed and is in the RECORD.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think it was ever reduced to writing. The resolution providing for the expenses of the special committee has been reduced to writing and has been printed.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just read the motion.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from North Carolina has just read the motion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is in the RECORD; that is all there was of it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The vote by which the motion was agreed to has been reconsidered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that the vote of the Senate has been reconsidered, and that the motion is now before the Senate. I want the motion before the Senate reduced to writing.

Mr. LODGE. If the request of the Senator is that the motion of the Senator from North Carolina shall be reduced to writing, that is proper enough; but if his request is that the original motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and made a day or two ago and printed in the RECORD shall be so presented, that seems to me wholly unnecessary.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think, under the rules, upon the demand of a Senator a motion or a resolution presented has to be reduced to writing.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will be in order. There will be no recognitions until the Senate is in order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a parliamentary inquiry pending. The Chair understands that the motion has been reduced to writing. When it was made it was taken down by the reporters, and it has been reduced to writing.

Mr. HEFLIN. That was the point I was going to make, Mr. President.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to have the original motion read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the original motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I can read it to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to know if the Secretary has it. If it has been reduced to writing, the Secretary certainly must have it.

Mr. LODGE. It was reduced to writing and appears printed in the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I should like the attention of the Senate for just a moment, if I can have the floor. The Senator from Georgia made a great many charges on the floor. I do not agree that the motion as proposed to be amended provides merely for an investigation of the particular charge which we, perhaps, all have in mind, and that is the charge of the misconduct of the officers in the American Expeditionary Force in France. Among the charges made by the Senator from Georgia was the unfairness of the Committee on Military Affairs as a tribunal to ascertain the facts. I do not think we need to investigate that; but under the proposed amendment of the motion every charge made by the Senator from Georgia would be subject to investigation. I simply suggest to the Senator that I certainly think it would be broad enough if he would add at the end of the motion the words "concerning the misconduct of officers of the Expeditionary Force in France during the late war."

Mr. LENROOT. No, Mr. President; that is not the charge.

Mr. LODGE. That is not the charge.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it is simply desired to investigate the charge of hanging men and killing men without court-martial, then the motion ought to be limited to that; but if we are to adopt the motion as now amended by the Senator from North Carolina we certainly shall have the whole field wide open for investigation; and I do not think that such action should be taken.

Mr. SIMMONS. No, Mr. President; the Senator from North Dakota makes a mistake. My amendment does not enlarge or abridge the scope of the investigation as provided for in the original motion of the Senator from Wisconsin. It adopts the very language of the Senator from Wisconsin with reference to the charges. It does not change that at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator is mistaken, if he will allow me.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is not mistaken; I have just looked over that with great care with him.

Mr. SIMMONS. The charges were definite. We had been discussing those charges, and toward the conclusion of that discussion the Senator from Wisconsin offered his motion to invite the Senator from Georgia to appear before the committee and to investigate the charges which he had made.

Mr. LODGE. That is the language.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the language. I have not enlarged that language.

Mr. LODGE. And the Senate adopted that language.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senate adopted it. That is what we are doing now; that is the only authority proposed to be conferred upon the committee now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the vote upon the amendment is taken will the Senator inform me what the charges are?

Mr. SIMMONS. The charges are those referred to in the RECORD of which the motion is a part.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is a pretty broad proposition. I think we ought to know definitely what we are to investigate.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. In the remarks which I made, at the conclusion of which I made the motion, I stated the charge made by the Senator from Georgia as follows:

> How many Senators know that a private soldier was frequently shot by his officers because of some complaint against officers' insolence; and that they had gallows upon which men were hanged, day after day, without court-martial or any other form of trial? How many Senators know that? I had and have the photograph of one of those gallows upon which 21 white boys had already been executed at sunrise when the photograph was taken.

I stated that that was the charge made by the Senator from Georgia, and I moved that a special committee be appointed to investigate that charge.

Mr. WILLIS. The Senator omitted to state the last sentence at the end of the paragraph. The entire paragraph is as follows:

> How many Senators know that a private soldier was frequently shot by his officers because of some complaint against officers' insolence; and that they had gallows upon which men were hanged, day after day, without court-martial or any other form of trial? How many Senators know that? I had and have the photograph of one of those gallows, upon which 21 white boys had already been executed at sunrise when the photograph was taken; and there were others waiting in the camp jails to be hanged morning after morning.

I call especial attention to the words:

> And there were others waiting in the camp jails to be hanged morning after morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested the proposed amendment and the motion as it would read if it were adopted.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin on November 1, as it appears on page 7070 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, reads:

> I move that the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to invite the Senator from Georgia to appear before them and to investigate the charges which he makes.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Let the Secretary, please, read the motion as it would be if the amendment were adopted.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senator from North Carolina proposes to substitute for that motion the following:

> That the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON].

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, as one member of that committee, I am very desirous that there be no misunderstanding as to the jurisdiction of the committee. This matter arose out of remarks made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at page 7021. One paragraph, which has just now been read by the Senator from Wisconsin, was quoted by the Senator from New York in his remarks at page 7068 of the RECORD. It is my understanding that the charges therein contained are the charges that are to be investigated by this committee.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, as I understand the charges made by the Senator from Georgia and referred to by the Senator from Wisconsin in his motion, there is practically no limit to the investigation. You are going into the entire question of the conduct of the officers of the Expeditionary Forces. It is true that he made a specific charge, but he also charged that these things were going on from day to day, and how are you going to investigate it without going through the entire conduct of all the officers?

It seems to me, Mr. President, that we have been proceeding on this matter considerably in the town-meeting style from the beginning. If we are going to investigate this matter so that if the American Army has been slandered the slander may be lifted, there ought to be some care exercised in drawing this resolution, and there ought to be an investigation to which the American people will give some consideration after the report is made. It will be very difficult to lift the entire charge and the entire slander, if it be such, from the American officers in Europe unless the investigation is wide-reaching and thorough and searching, and I do not think there is a Senator upon the floor who now knows to what extent this committee is authorized to go.

I merely make that suggestion. It seems to me that the matter is a very serious one, and that the resolution ought to be drawn with deliberation and care, and we ought to know precisely the jurisdiction of the committee before it enters upon its duties. I think an investigation limited to the mere question as to whether men were hung upon a particular gallows, and whether or not they were tried by court-martial in one particular instance, would have very little effect in removing the almost universal charges which have come against the American officers from ex-service men since they have returned home.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I rise to a question of high privilege. A messenger from the House has been waiting 15 minutes.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho loses entirely the point of this matter. If men have been hanged without trial, the men who are responsible for it ought to be hanged. It is not a question of general misconduct of the Army. If these charges are true, some action must be taken. That is the purpose of this committee—to ascertain the fact of the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I agree thoroughly with the Senator from Wisconsin that the officers ought to be hanged. We all agree to that, but, Mr. President, the proposition is to find out the officers. It is said that there was a particular gallows situated in a particular group of willows in a particular place in France to which the Senator from Georgia may have had reference; but if you clean out that particular group of willows and ignore the charges which are floating through the country as to other misconduct equally reprehensible, you have no exculpation of the Army at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator permit a question that may elucidate the idea he is suggesting?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. Assume that the witnesses were not able to show anything in respect to a gallows or as to hanging, but assume that the proof were plenary that men were convicted by court-martial of trivial offenses and given excessive and outrageous sentences, or that others were punished—not by hanging, but in other fashions—for trivial offenses, without trial.

Under the resolution would it be said that testimony of the nature that I have thus tentatively presented could not be heard? Is it the purpose of the resolution to confine this investigation to a mere question of a specific number of hangings under specific circumstances?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the purpose of this inquiry is not to ascertain whether officers have been guilty of negligence, whether there has been dereliction of duty in the respect of which the Senator from California speaks, but whether officers have been guilty of crimes, of murder, in the respect charged by the Senator from Georgia. If they have, of course action should be had.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is my inquiry. If that is the purpose of the resolution——

Mr. LENROOT. That is the purpose.

Mr. JOHNSON. Merely to inquire concerning these specific hangings, then the findings of the committee are going to be exactly of the sort that the Senator from Idaho suggests. They are not going to be the kind that any of us would desire, were we interested in the particular transaction.

For instance, suppose testimony comes to this committee that officers have punished men with excessive and outrageous sentences for trivial offenses. The committee says: "We decline to consider that kind of testimony, because the culprit was not hanged." Is it not obvious to you that then whatever finding your committee makes will be met not in the fashion in which we desire to meet charges of this sort, but that your finding will be considered upon a specific matter and will be wholly unsatisfactory, while other matters will go without investigation?

The reason why I make this suggestion is in line with what has been stated. If an investigation is to be made, let that investigation find the one thing or the other.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me one moment——

Mr. JOHNSON. Surely.

Mr. LODGE. There has been a most elaborate investigation of all the cases that the Senator mentions—most elaborate. Thousands of pages of testimony have been taken. It was known at the Ansell investigation. All the things that the Senator has been referring to have been investigated.

Mr. JOHNSON. I realize that. I am not enamored of investigations. In fact, in this particular case, were it not for the peculiar circumstances, I would not favor an investigation at all.

Mr. LODGE. But do we need to reinvestigate them?

Mr. JOHNSON. But if you are going to have an investigation, it ought to be a full investigation.

Mr. LODGE. A large part of it has been done already.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator says a large part of it has been done already. As a matter of fact, it has all been done. That investigation was supposed to be thorough and sweeping, and did not exclude from its consideration the hanging of men if it had taken place.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No such charge had ever been made before.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely so; but Mr. Ansell ransacked the entire history of the Army across the sea and brought forth everything he could find that was in the nature of misconduct.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator from Georgia says he has testimony to back his charges.

Mr. BORAH. Precisely; but if it is true, in other words, that the investigation overlooked a hanging, then it was no investigation at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, does the Senator say that we should not investigate the charges of murder, just because they have not been made before?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not say so; but I say that we ought to know what we are going to investigate. Are you going to investigate the one single proposition that was referred to by the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what the resolution we are acting under now does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was the understanding of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say that the motion on its face shows that it was intended to create a committee to investigate certain specific charges made by the Senator from Georgia. That motion followed shortly after—on the next page, I believe—a statement made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], the chairman of the Military Affairs Committee.

The Senator from New York said:

> Mr. President, I desire very briefly, but with all the emphasis I can command, to call the attention of the Senate, and especially may I say of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON], to a passage in the remarks of the Senator from Georgia delivered yesterday upon the floor of the Senate, having to do with the Army of the United States and making a charge against the Army such as I have never heard made before.
> I am going to read those paragraphs from the Senator's speech, which will be found on page 7021 of the RECORD. In referring to our soldiers abroad the Senator from Georgia spoke, in part, as follows:
> "How many Senators know that a private soldier was frequently shot by his officers because of some complaint against officers' insolence; and that they had gallows upon which men were hanged, day after day, without court-martial or any other form of trial? How many Senators know that? I had and have the photograph of one of those gallows, upon which 21 white boys had already been executed at sunrise when the photograph was taken; and there were others waiting in the camp jails to be hanged morning after morning."

The Senator in his additional remarks probably referred to other charges made by the Senator from Georgia. Following that, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] again read the charges made by the Senator from Georgia, and made this motion, which, upon its face, shows that it was directed to the charges then under discussion made by the Senator from Georgia, and only those charges——

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

Mr. SIMMONS. Because it is provided in the motion that the Senator from Georgia shall be invited to come before the special committee, and the committee is directed to investigate the charges made by him.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. MYERS. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will not proceed until it is in order.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. SIMMONS. I will yield in just one minute, if the Senator will pardon me, if he will let me finish this statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wanted to ask the Senator—he had finished that statement—whether or not the words used by the Senator from Wisconsin exactly follow all that is in the words used by the Senator from New York? As they were read, I thought they left out the statement concerning the punishment of men for trivial offenses.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was not in the statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. It was in the statement made by the Senator from New York, which the Senator has just read.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I never mentioned trivial offenses.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield.

Mr. MYERS. I think it would entirely simplify the matter and make it perfectly plain if the Senator would add to his amendment, right at the end of it, after the words "Mr. WATSON," the words "made by him this day on the floor of the Senate."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, when the Senator's amendment shall have been disposed of I shall offer an amendment adding at the end of the motion "to wit," stating exactly the words that the Senator has just read.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want it distinctly understood that the Senator from Georgia does not want to limit this investigation. I think the Senator from Georgia rather courts an investigation of other charges than those made at that time. I think he proposes to supplement those charges with others, and he can have no motive in desiring to limit it. I was simply amending the motion under which the committee is now proceeding. I shall be very glad if you will so broaden it that it will embrace any other charges that may be made by the Senator from Georgia or anybody else.

Mr. LENROOT. I want simply to make it clear by adopting words covering all the charges which gave rise to this question.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from North Carolina is very properly trying to amend the original motion in what I conceive to be a proper and desirable manner. If that is done, then there will come before us the resolution reported by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and we can put in the amendment suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin to broaden and define the jurisdiction of the committee. That resolution is before us. It is here in print.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it must be apparent to all of us that this body should proceed with some deliberation and in due form. I do not believe anyone here has in mind clearly the charges which the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] would have investigated. There is no reason for this informal procedure. If we limit the investigation to the precise language used by the Senator from Georgia, I submit that that would not cover the field we all desire to have covered. Then why should not the motion now before the Senate for disposition be referred to some committee, so that that committee may change the form of the motion and put it in some regular form?

I see no reason why it should not be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, or even to the special committee which the Senate appointed to investigate the charges, to put the motion in language which will clearly express the things to be investigated, so that the Senate may know what they are. I have taken no special interest in this matter, but it seems to me that the Senator from Wisconsin, who made the motion, ought to be content, and doubtless he would be content, to have the motion now referred to a committee, so that that committee may revise the motion and put it in such form that it would be authorized to investigate the things we think ought to be investigated. I do not care to make a motion to that effect, but I suggest that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] or the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] move that the motion be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, or to the special committee which has been appointed to make this investigation, for the purpose of having the motion itself put in such form as that committee deems to be proper, and let that committee broaden its scope or limit its scope, as the committee might feel the exigencies of the occasion require.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to suggest that at the present time there is no special committee. That committee is no longer in existence, because the vote by which its appointment was authorized has been reconsidered.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Then I think it would very properly go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senator would not make that suggestion if he had been here during these colloquies. This whole matter arose partly because the Senator from Georgia challenged the Military Affairs Committee.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. My suggestion is, not to have the Committee on Military Affairs make the investigation, but merely to formulate the motion or resolution which would limit the scope of the investigation.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator from Wisconsin, who made the original motion, will now offer an amendment to his motion; it will sufficiently specify and enlarge the scope of the original motion.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I rose to offer an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, which perhaps will be agreed to by the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. LENROOT. I hope the Senator will not offer that at this time. We can consider that when we come to take up the resolution. I hope the Senator will not complicate this matter now.

Mr. STERLING. I hoped to simplify, rather than complicate, Mr. President, by the amendment; but I am not offering it just now. The whole proposition comes down to one paragraph of the speech made by the Senator from Georgia on October 31. Our attention was first called to it by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and he quoted a particular paragraph, and that is all he quoted. The attention of the Senate has been directed to the charges, expressed or implied, in that one paragraph from the speech of the Senator from Georgia, and it seems to me that that is a field broad enough for the investigating committee to attempt to cover.

A suggestion has been made that the investigation take a wider scope. The charges in that one paragraph are very serious indeed, and if it is found that the jurisdiction of the committee ought to be enlarged or extended for the purpose of investigating other things mentioned by Senators, it can be done; but that surely is enough for the present time.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, there is no disagreement. That can be taken care of in the resolution, and I sincerely hope the Senator will not press his amendment.

Mr. STERLING. I do not offer it now, I will say to the Senator, in view of his statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask for a vote on my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, nobody knows what we are acting on. Nobody knows what the jurisdiction of this committee would be. If 12 o'clock comes without this being acted on, I suppose under the rule it would go to the calendar; but what would go to the calendar, what sort of a resolution?

Mr. LODGE. At 12 o'clock we will lay the tax bill aside temporarily and finish this matter.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Massachusetts need not manifest so much feeling with reference to the matter.

Mr. LODGE. It is not a matter of feeling; it is a matter of getting the business of the Senate done; that is all.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It seems to me the more we go into this matter the more we muddle it. The Senate does not know what it is trying to do; as a matter of fact, it does not know what it is doing. Under the rules of the Senate, at 12 o'clock this resolution would go to the calendar; and yet what would the RECORD to-morrow show had gone to the calendar? What would the calendar show? As a matter of fact, there is no resolution properly before the Senate.

It is suggested that this paragraph on page 7068, which has been read, contains all the charges that were made by the Senator from Georgia. Before the Senator from Wisconsin made his motion, the Senator from Georgia had said this in the Senate, referring to the soldiers:

> I can prove that they were made to go on useless hikes and unnecessarily exposed and sacrificed and left on the road to die.

Is that charge to be investigated under this motion? It was made on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Georgia before the Senator from Wisconsin made his motion.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will read the RECORD he will find that the Senator from New York read the specific charge which he was calling to the attention of the Senate. I read the same thing in my remarks, and upon that alone I based my motion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But the motion was to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia, and what I have just read is one of the charges made by the Senator from Georgia before the Senator from Wisconsin offered his motion. The mere statement by the Senator from Wisconsin of certain things which the Senator had charged does not limit the special committee within the language of the motion. I simply wanted to know whether that charge is to be investigated or whether the committee which will be appointed will have jurisdiction to investigate that charge.

Then, again, before the Senator from Wisconsin made his motion, the Senator from Georgia said this, referring to the soldiers:

> In the hospitals they were neglected. The officers made courtesans of too many of the nurses—not all of them, but too many of them. In the hospitals, on the roadside, wounded, suffering, and dying, those men were treated inhumanly.

Will the committee investigate that charge? Will it have authority to investigate that charge? Is it intended that the committee shall investigate that charge? It seems to me that under the motion, made as it was after the charges were made, it would have authority to investigate them. Yet the sponsors of the motion apparently think those charges would not be investigated; that the only jurisdiction the committee would have would be to investigate the statements made in the paragraph quoted by the Senator from New York when he brought this matter up.

Then again, the Senator from Georgia, before the Senator from Wisconsin made his motion, said:

> One of the leading doctors, perhaps the leading doctor of the State Sanitarium of Georgia, told me at my house when he was attending me that a head nurse of one of the hospital wards told him that in one night 65 of these young men died of pneumonia because they were not sufficiently covered with blankets and did not have sufficient attention.

Is it intended that the committee shall investigate the truth of that statement made by the Senator from Georgia? Of course, it is not the purpose to investigate as to whether or not the Senator from Georgia stated the truth when he said he had been told this, but I take it that it is a question as to whether or not the committee shall investigate the truth of the statement made to him, that 65 of these young men died in one night. That is a very serious matter.

Then the Senator from Georgia made this charge which, while of course it does not refer to the men, makes a serious charge against the officers of the Army:

> Why were 8,000 automobiles parked at Lyons, within the forks of those two rivers, in that narrow valley where a flood comes every year, in order that they might be ruined by the spring overflow?

Is it the intention that the committee shall investigate that charge? It was made before the motion to investigate the charges was made.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, just before the language last quoted by the Senator is this statement, which the Senator's eye probably did not catch, a statement after a colloquy:

> I mean exactly that; and, Mr. President, I here say that this country never has learned one-half of what our soldiers suffered. I have had the private soldier tell me that he would march on the wet, cold, half-frozen ground, barefooted, begging for shoes, when, as we all know, we had mountains of shoes ready to give away to France, apparently.

Of course, the matter of giving things away to France is immaterial, but the absence of shoes is material.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair desires to say that it believes it was in error in a reply to a parliamentary inquiry made by the Senator from Washington, and it is of the opinion that any Senator can now demand or insist that the motion shall be reduced to writing.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I insist upon that, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. What motion?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Wisconsin made a motion which was referred to a committee after a long debate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No.

Mr. REED. What motion was it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The motion was debated——

Mr. REED. Certainly it was.

Mr. JONES of Washington (continuing). Without being referred to a committee.

Mr. REED. What is the motion which must be reduced to writing?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the motion which the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] made two or three days ago. That is before the Senate, and I ask that that matter be reduced to writing.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule governing this matter is Rule XXI, which reads:

All motions shall be reduced to writing, if desired by the presiding officer or by any Senator, and shall be read before the same shall be debated.

The vote by which the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin was adopted has been reconsidered, and, in the judgment of the Chair, on the request or demand of any Senator it must be reduced to writing.

Mr. REED. Perhaps I do not understand the situation, and I desire to understand it. The Senator from Wisconsin made a motion for the appointment of a committee and an investigation, which was referred to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was adopted immediately.

Mr. LODGE. It was adopted immediately and unanimously.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It was adopted immediately, and not referred to a committee.

Mr. REED. Very well. Subsequent to that a resolution was offered to authorize the committee to compel the production of books and papers, which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which resolution was reported back, and we had some debate on it.

Mr. LODGE. No; if the Senator will pardon me, it was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which reported this morning favorably, and the resolution has gone to the calendar.

Mr. REED. Now, I understand the Senator from North Carolina moved to reconsider the vote by which the original motion was adopted, and it was reconsidered. Thereupon the Senator from North Carolina moved to amend the motion by striking out certain words.

Mr. SIMMONS. And inserting.

Mr. REED. Is that the motion which the Chair holds must be written out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin which the Chair rules must be reduced to writing upon the request of any Senator or of the Presiding Officer.

Mr. REED. What became of the motion of the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has not been adopted yet.

Mr. LODGE. It is pending.

Mr. REED. Then we have nothing to do with anybody else's motion except the pending motion of the Senator from North Carolina. Why can we not dispose of that?

Mr. LODGE. That is what I would like to see done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside for the further discussion of the matter now before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Dakota asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I submit, in writing, the motion in the original form so that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina may apply to it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the original motion, which has now been reduced to writing.

The READING CLERK. Motion made by the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]:

I move that the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to invite the Senator from Georgia to appear before them and to investigate the charges which he makes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask that the Secretary may read the amendment which I offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina will be read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Offered in the form of a resolution:

Senate resolution 166.

Resolved, That the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on November 1, 1921, be amended to read as follows: "That the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina to the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment to the motion was agreed to.

The motion as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now reappoints the Senators formerly named as members of the special committee.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If the Chair will pardon me, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] was originally named and then a change was made. I think the Chair had better state the names of the Senators, so that their names will appear in the RECORD?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senators named and who will now constitute the committee are the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. WILLIS], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair now lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I hope, now that an agreement has been reached on the motion, the Senate will be willing to dispose of the report of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, otherwise the committee just named can not act.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts, as the Chair understands it, asks unanimous consent to take up for consideration Senate resolution 165. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask that the resolution may be read by the Secretary. Then I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that in view of the modification made in the vote of the Senate appointing the committee and the language employed some changes should be made in the resolution, if the Senator will offer an amendment to effectuate it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will state the amendment proposed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Let the resolution be read as it is first, and then the Senator from Wisconsin will move a modification.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read Senate resolution 165, submitted by Mr. BRANDEGEE November 2 and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and this day reported favorably without amendment by Mr. CALDER from that committee, as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Chair to invite the junior Senator from Georgia to appear before them and to investigate the charges made by him affecting the conduct of officers of the Army in inflicting punishment upon enlisted men of the Expeditionary Forces in the late war is hereby authorized, until it finishes said investigation and reports, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths and employ a stenographer, at a cost not to exceed $1.25 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with the subject pending before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate upon authorization of the chairman, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate at any place.

Mr. LENROOT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Amend by striking out of lines 2 and 3 the following words: "invite the junior Senator from Georgia to appear before them and to."

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, before the question is put I wish to ask if the powers are sufficiently stated in the resolution to authorize the payment of witnesses and the procuring of such documents as the Senator from Georgia may desire to bring to the attention of the committee?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The language of the resolution is that the expenses thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund. I assume that the expenses of the investigation are authorized to be paid out of the contingent fund. It has always been customary to pay witnesses their mileage and their other expenses. However, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that, as he has hurriedly made his motion to strike out certain words, he has left in the words "made by him."

Mr. LENROOT. I have a further amendment to offer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Before the motion is voted upon I should like to hear it read as it would read if amended.

Mr. LENROOT. Then I will offer the other amendment so that it may be also presented. I move to strike out the word "him," in line 4, and to insert "the junior Senator from Georgia."

Mr. SIMMONS. Striking out the invitation clause?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the resolution as it will read if the amendments proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin are adopted.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Chair to investigate the charges made by the junior Senator from Georgia affecting the conduct of officers of the Army in inflicting punishment upon enlisted men of the Expeditionary Forces in the late war is hereby authorized, etc.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Wisconsin if that is all the amendment he expects to offer?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I have another amendment to offer, when the pending amendment is agreed to, that will incorporate the charges referred to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think we ought, in this resolution, merely providing for the payment of money, to try to limit the jurisdiction of the committee as given to it by the original motion. The original motion as adopted by the Senate to-day is just as broad as it can be so far as any charges made by the Senator from Georgia are concerned. Any attempt to limit them upon this resolution, it seems to me, would not be proper. The resolution as now worded does limit the jurisdiction of the committee compared to what we just voted a few moments ago.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know whether the Senator from Washington was on the floor when this arose or not——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was.

Mr. LENROOT. But if he did not understand what was contemplated by every Member of the Senate to be investigated by the committee, all other Senators understood it; and I propose now, when the time comes, merely to offer an interpretative amendment construing the original motion as every Senator must have understood it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator can, of course, give his judgment, but he can not construe what was in the minds of various Senators. I know that Senators have come to me and wanted to know just what would be the jurisdiction of the committee. Some of them thought it was broad and other Senators thought it was narrow.

I thought it meant the investigation of all the charges made by the Senator from Georgia. That is what I supposed we were voting upon. That is exactly what we have done to-day. We have authorized this committee to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia. The Senator from Georgia made the charges that I read to the Senate and which the Senator from Missouri read to the Senate. Now, by confining it to the language read by the Senator from New York it would limit the jurisdiction of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator object to that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do object to it after we have just adopted a motion giving them the broadest authority to investigate charges.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Washington is speaking of technicalities and nothing else.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am not speaking of technicalities; I am speaking about the substance. It is the Senator from Wisconsin who tries to inject technicalities into the matter. The Senate less than 10 minutes ago voted a resolution giving the committee the broadest possible authority so far as concerns any charges made by the Senator from Georgia. The Senator from Wisconsin now desires to limit that jurisdiction by specifying certain things. It seems to me the Senate is putting itself in a very awkward attitude if it adopts any such amendment.

I wanted to call attention to the language of the resolution that is now pending and the way it will stand unless it is proposed to make it broader. It reads:

Investigate the charges made by the junior Senator from Georgia affecting the conduct of officers of the Army in inflicting punishment upon enlisted men.

Now, the Senator from Georgia has made charges not only that the acts were done to inflict punishment upon the men but charges that certainly are just as serious as any of the charges that officers were doing things for the purpose of inflicting punishment. Yet, under the language of the resolution as now proposed, it would probably limit the jurisdiction of the committee, or at any rate it would certainly make it doubtful whether the committee could use any of the money authorized by the resolution to investigate charges that were made on this floor by the Senator from Georgia.

The Senator from Wisconsin said that he is going to quote from the RECORD, specifying certain charges made. Then the question will come before the committee whether or not under the resolution they can use any of the money authorized by Congress to investigate other charges specified. It seems to me that in the resolution authorizing the expenditure of money we ought to follow the language the Senate has adopted. I think these are very serious charges and that they should be investigated.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. But we ought not to make doubtful the authority of the committee either in the expenditure of the money or in investigating the charges.

I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. The Senate a few moments ago adopted a motion in certain language. The Senator from Washington construes the language to mean one thing. The Senator from Wisconsin construes it to mean another thing. The Senator from Wisconsin now says that he proposes to offer an amendment which will construe and limit the language already adopted. It may be that it ought to have been done on the other question, but he certainly has the right to offer an amendment to the resolution that will construe the original proposition and limit the authority of the committee. Does not the Senator think that is right?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No. I ask that the original resolution now be read.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. But will not the Senator from Washington permit the Senator from Wisconsin to offer his amendment by which he intends to construe the original resolution?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I will not. He can offer that in a moment.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Then we could understand what he has in view.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish the Senator from Indiana would listen to the resolution which the Senate has just adopted. There is no room for construction with reference to the language of that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The resolution as agreed to reads as follows:

Resolved, That the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] on November 1, 1921, be amended to read as follows: "That the Chair appoint a special committee of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON]."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Where is there any room for a construction of the language, "investigate the charges made"? Why, in the resolution providing for the expenditure of money should you try to limit those charges? Why did you not limit it in the original resolution and state just what charges the committee is authorized to investigate? I think in this resolution authorizing the committee to expend the money of the Senate we ought to follow the language of the resolution creating it. That is all I have to say in reference to the matter.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Secretary to repeat the reading of the resolution which he just read. It struck me that certain words must be omitted. If he read the wrong one, I would like to have the right one read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin (Mr. LENROOT) on November 1, 1921, be amended to read as follows:

"That the Chair appoint a special committee consisting of five Senators to investigate the charges made by the Senator from Georgia (Mr. WATSON)."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. That appears to be correct.

The vote of the Senate adopting the resolution will give the committee its jurisdiction. There is now a resolution to pay the expenses of the committee. The language of the resolution, which the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] has been criticizing in that resolution, is language simply to identify the committee. It does not confer any power or jurisdiction as to what shall be investigated. I will ask the Secretary to read the language of the resolution just reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I suggest to the Senator from Connecticut that the amendments which are suggested also be read.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask that the resolution be read, together with the amendments which have been so far agreed to up to this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Chair to investigate the charges made by the junior Senator from Georgia affecting the conduct of officers of the Army in inflicting punishment upon enlisted men of the Expeditionary Forces in the late war is hereby authorized——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. At that point, the recital about inflicting punishment upon enlisted men is simply descriptive of the committee; it does not confer power on the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We have heretofore passed no resolution of which that is descriptive.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It may be an incorrect description of the committee; but my point is it does not affect the jurisdiction of the committee or limit or extend it. The jurisdiction of the committee must be that conveyed by the vote of the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Why not follow the language of the resolution providing for the investigation?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no objection to following it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Does not the Senator think we ought to follow it?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think we ought to follow it. Inasmuch as we have changed the jurisdiction of the committee by reconsidering the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin, I would use other language to describe what that committee was, but I do not think the language of the pending resolution enlarges or limits the jurisdiction of the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. REED. The amendment had better be stated.

Mr. LENROOT. Before the resolution is adopted, I merely wish to say that I stated that I would offer another amendment to the resolution construing the original motion, but inasmuch as it has been generally agreed that it is not necessary to do so, and there is a very general understanding as to what the jurisdiction of the committee is, notwithstanding the statements of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], I shall not offer the amendment.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want any misapprehension to be created because of the statement of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] that "there is a very general understanding" as to what these charges are. The resolution speaks for itself; it is as broad as its language, and must not be limited by any "understanding" that some individual Senator may have in his mind. I am making that statement so that it may not hereafter be said that by common consent we agreed to some sort of construction which the Senator from Wisconsin might have in his mind.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, of course the committee will act under the resolution of the Senate.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the resolution.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for the reading of a letter which I have received this morning, in connection with the punishment of American soldiers. It is from an Army officer who was in charge and who claims to speak by authority, and I think it is pertinent to the charges.

The writer of the letter is a lawyer living in Tennessee. He is unknown to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

NASHVILLE, TENN., November 2, 1921.

Hon. K. D. MCKELLAR,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: Was greatly surprised at the absurd statement of Senator WATSON, reported in the press on yesterday, to the effect that 21 men had been executed in France.

I was assigned to duty in the "office of the Acting Judge Advocate General for the American Expeditonary Forces in Europe," and was directed by Col. H. A. White (who succeeded Gen. E. A. Kreger) to carefully prepare a statistical report of the cases reviewed in our office. With the assistance of two field clerks, I prepared this report, the writer checking death sentences, life sentences, and the action of the reviewing authority and the action of the Judge Advocate General's office thereon.

The writer knows of his own knowledge, from an examination of the records covering a period of several weeks, that the total number of cases in which the accused was sentenced to death was 28. Of this number 9 were carried into effect, 7 for rape, and 2 for murder. In 12 cases the death sentence was modified, and in 7 cases the conviction was set aside and disapproved.

Life sentence was imposed in 78 cases. It was carried out in 56 cases, modified in 19 cases, and disapproved in 3 cases.

The Articles of War carrying a death sentence were as follows: Fifty-eighth. Desertion: Four hundred and forty-six men were charged with a violation of this article, 168 of whom were found guilty as charged, 207 were found guilty of a lesser included offense, 67 were acquitted, and the sentence in 4 cases was suspended or remitted. Seventy-fifth: Running in the face of the enemy. Four hundred and sixty men were charged, 228 found guilty, 17 guilty of a lesser included offense, and 215 were acquitted or their conviction disapproved. Under the ninety-second article—murder and rape—the number were as follows: Rape and assault with intent to rape, 106 men were charged with this offense, 62 found guilty, 5 guilty of a lesser included offense, and 39 were acquitted or the sentence disapproved. On a charge of murder, 109 men were charged, 43 found guilty as charged, 31 found guilty of a lesser included offense, and 35 were acquitted or their conviction disapproved.

Senator NEW'S statement that the death sentence was carried out in nine cases is correct, and not in a single instance for a military offense. His figures were based upon the report made by me and submitted to the Judge Advocate General's Office at Washington, or was checked by that office and found to be correct.

Am taking the liberty of writing you because I resent Senator WATSON'S effort to mislead and prejudice the people, when he does not know the facts. Of course, as to his charge that soldiers were executed with trial, I know nothing.

Yours, very truly,

JOHN H. LECHLEITER.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have no doubt that in the last sentence the writer of the letter which has just been read by the Secretary meant to use the word "without" instead of "with," so that the language should read "without trial."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to amend the resolution further. In lines 4, 5, and 6 I move to strike out the words "affecting the conduct of the officers of the Army in inflicting punishment upon enlisted men of the American Expeditionary Forces in the late war." Then I want to follow that by another amendment, which is practically part of it, by inserting after the word "Chair," in line 2, the words "pursuant to the resolution adopted November 4"; in other words, that would make the resolution now pending comply exactly with the resolution which the Senate has to-day adopted.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Now, will the Senator read it as it would read as amended?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then, as I understand, the resolution would read in this way:

Resolved, That the special committee appointed by the Chair pursuant to the resolution adopted November 4 to investigate the charges made by the junior Senator from Georgia is hereby authorized, until it finishes the said investigation and reports—

And so forth. If the two sugestions may be offered as one amendment, I make that motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington to strike out and insert.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] if he received a copy of a letter from Mr. Lechleiter, of Nashville. The letter which has just been read, I suppose, is a copy of a letter which has been written to me by Mr. Lechleiter and received by me this morning. I did not bring the letter over with me, and I am wondering if the letter read at the desk is a copy of the letter written me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No. The Secretary has it in his possession and he can state what it is; but my recollection of it is that it is a letter which I received. It was addressed to me by this gentleman in Tennessee. I repeat, the Secretary has the letter at the desk.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Evidently it is addressed to the Senator from Connecticut as an inclosure of a copy of a letter which had been addressed to me.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No.

The McKELLAR. The letter on its face so indicates.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, all I know about it is that the letter was in the envelope in which my secretary brings my letters to me. The envelope was not with it. I read the letter on the floor, and had it sent to the desk.

Mr. McKELLAR. I merely wanted to know how it came into the Senator's possession. It did not come from my office. I received the original of the letter, of which a copy has been read at the desk. I wish to state that Mr. Lechleiter is one of our very best citizens, a lawyer of excellent ability, at one time a member of the State legislature, and a gentleman of high character. He was a major in the judge advocate's office in the American Expeditionary Forces in France. He made a fine record while there, and his statements can be absolutely relied on. They do not seem to bear upon the specific charges made by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] which, as I understand them, assert that private soldiers were executed without trial by court-martial.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, it will be remembered that I was proceeding to read various letters and telegrams, a pile of which I had on my desk, when I was taken off my feet by a call for the regular order, of which I do not complain.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make a parliamentary inquiry, to ascertain whether or not the resolution has been agreed to, before he proceeds?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator allow the Senate to vote on the resolution before he proceeds?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall not fatigue the Senate by reading the remainder of the letters. At some other time I shall do so. I know that Senators want to get the right of way for their great revenue bill, and I have no desire to obstruct it; but I call attention to the fact that the letter which has just been read contradicts the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], and contradicts the Secretary of War. That makes three official witnesses contradicting one another.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, the Washington Post of this morning contains an article headed as follows:

Probe of hangings meets opposition.—Democrats in Senate will try to have inquiry stopped at session to-day.

Mr. President, this statement is misleading. It does not state the fact. The Democrats have not tried to stop the inquiry. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] has not tried to stop it. He has invited it. The Senator from Georgia was resenting efforts to take him into a committee room and question him about the speech that he made upon this floor. If the charges made by the Senator from Georgia are true, he has done the American people and the Army a great service. If American soldiers have been brutally treated in France, the American people are entitled to know it. If the ex-service men who told the Senator from Georgia of these things have not told the truth, then the Army officers whose conduct is in question will be exonerated. But I submit to the Senate and to the country that these boys who wore the American uniform and went to the battle front and offered their lives for their country are entitled to be heard by the Senator from Georgia or by any other Senator in this Chamber. I do not care whether a man is a humble private or an officer; when he comes to a Senator and tells him of some outrageous and brutal treatment imposed upon a soldier in the service, the Senator ought to have courage and Americanism enough to stand here and demand that the matter be investigated and the truth made known. Shall the Senator whose heart is touched and stirred by things told him by boys who offered their lives for their country be mistreated and intimidated because he dares to suggest an investigation?

When did it become a crime for a Senator to get up here and question some officer's treatment of a private in the United States Army? I happen to know about one case where an officer is seeking promotion, and that officer's treatment of three boys who had been gassed was brutally inhuman.

They were suffering; they were weak and too feeble to walk and he cursed them and ordered them to get out of an army truck that was carrying them to the hospital. That officer's conduct was cruel and barbarous. If an army officer recommended for promotion by a committee of the majority of this Senate can get by with a thing like that, I do not know but that other things of a reprehensible character have been done to privates in France. It is necessary to have order and discipline in the army and authority must be given to certain officers to see that army rules and regulations are obeyed, but the people are entitled to know all about the conduct of the army. Human life is a very precious thing. The rights of an American citizen are very precious and when he puts on the uniform of his country he does not surrender those rights. He is entitled to have every protection and consideration thrown about him. If any officer has been brutal—and we know that some of them do become brutal—if any one has been brutal to American soldiers in France we are entitled to know it.

The Senator from Georgia has stood here and offered to give you the facts given to him by the ex-service men of his country. He has invited those who refute them to meet him in the open Senate. Does that look as though he wants to shut the investigation up, or as though he is dodging an investigation? I do not blame him for wanting to avoid going into a committee room over in the Senate Office Building, where, as he said, the facts will be entombed. Let this thing be conducted in the open. The American people are entitled to know if a soldier has been mistreated and outraged, and if executed how and for what offense. Let the facts be known. We know that in a mass of 4,000,000 of men there are bound to be some questionable characters and tough individuals. It may be that those who were executed should have been executed; I do not know; but it is a very serious thing to snuff out the life of a man, so let us go into this thing in an orderly fashion, and let the facts be known. Of course, the Negro who committed rape on the little French girl deserved the death penalty.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. Will the Senator of his own knowledge insert in the RECORD at this point the name of the commander in chief and the name of the Secretary of War under whose administration these atrocities took place?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am always glad to enlighten the Senator. I do not know of a Senator in this Chamber who needs enlightenment on so many subjects as does the genial and astute Senator from New Hampshire; but his memory seems to be exceedingly short. He knows, I am sure, who was President just preceding President Harding, but if he does not remember that far back, I will tell him his name; and I believe that he knows the name of the Secretary of War that was succeeded by ex-Senator Weeks, but if it has escaped his memory, I will furnish his name also. But, Mr. President, I do not care whether it was a Democrat or a Republican who was President or Secretary of War at that time. He did not know, probably, that these things were being done. It seems now that a great many people over here, both Republicans and Democrats, and Republican officials, too, did not know about some of these things. What I want is to get at the truth, and to do it without trying to browbeat and offend a Senator who dares, in the name of fair and just treatment of the American soldier, to make charges that affect the welfare of the men who wore the uniform of their country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I simply want to say that any suggestion that the Senator from Georgia [Mr. WATSON] or any other Senator upon this side of the Chamber did not desire an investigation of these charges is without any foundation whatever.

The Senator from Georgia made certain very serious charges upon the floor of the Senate. The Senator made those charges because he wanted them investigated. He never has had any objection to an investigating committee. I take it that that was his object in bringing these matters before the Senate, just as it would be the object of any other Senator in bringing before the Senate charges with reference to some officer of the Government or some department of the Government; but the Senator from Georgia and some of his friends, of whom I am one, objected very seriously to the character of the motion for an investigation as originally agreed to. That motion as originally agreed to seemed to him and seemed to me to convey, by implication at least, the impression that the investigation was in part to investigate the accuser as well as the accused.

I suppose the error that has brought about the confusion concerning this matter has grown out of the fact that it was known that I was going to offer this morning a resolution or a motion with reference to the matter, without the character of that motion being distinctly and definitely known. The purpose of my motion was simply to eliminate the objectionable language in the original motion and to make it responsive to the charges made by the Senator from Georgia and to secure an investigation such as he doubtless had in mind at the time he made the charges.

Mr. President, the Senate has now done with respect to this matter exactly what the Senator from Georgia desired. With the changes that have been made in this motion for an investigation the Senator from Georgia, as I understand, is entirely satisfied with it. I trust the investigation will be made, and will be made very thoroughly, and that the facts in this matter may be ascertained. I have no doubt the Senator from Georgia will lay before the committee in a proper and dignified way all the facts within his possession, and I am sure the committee will consider those facts and reach a conclusion satisfactory to itself and possibly to the Senate with reference to the charges.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I happen to be the Senator who first called attention to the form of this motion, and raised the point that it seemed to be a motion to investigate a Senator's speech, and against that I protested. I am very glad that the motion has been changed now so that the investigation is to be carried on to ascertain facts and not for the purpose of investigating a Senator's speech. That may not have been the intent of the Senator who made the motion originally, but it was susceptible of that construction. It was for that reason that I made the protest I did make. The motion is in proper form now, and so far as I am concerned I want to see the investigation proceed.

Perhaps we would all have been wiser if we had not acted so very hastily and impetuously about this matter. We may all think that before we are through; but the motion is now in proper form, and I have no objection to it.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF UNEMPLOYMENT CONFERENCE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication, with accompanying reports, from the Secretary of the President's Conference on Unemployment, setting forth recommendations bearing upon Federal action for the relief of unemployment, revival of private industry, etc., which, with the accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

TAX REVISION.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask that the unfinished business be laid before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the pending amendment, proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which has been read.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I desire in a word to express my attitude upon this bill. A tax scheme which requires one army of experts to teach honest people how to pay what is due the Government, and which creates another army of experts to teach the dishonest how to cheat the Government, is an abominable thing; and when in addition this scheme is unequal, inequitable, unjust, and discriminatory it becomes not only abominable, but intolerable; and it is because I think the pending bill is of that kind that I listen sympathetically to any alternative. I am prepared, therefore, to attempt almost any alternative which may be offered to this bill, which has met with such universal condemnation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the Members of the Senate have made up their minds as to just how they want to vote on a proposition for a turnover tax or a manufacturers' tax, and I shall not at this time go into the details of the difference between the pending amendment and the one that was voted upon last evening, but I will simply say that this amendment is similar to the one of which I have previously spoken, except that it provides for a business sales tax instead of a manufacturers' and producers' tax.

The business sales tax would be levied at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent of the amount by which the gross sales of any goods, wares, or merchandise, manufactured or purchased for sale, exceed the sum of $6,000 in any calendar year. Sales by farmers will be exempt under the definition.

The amendment also provides for the exemption of sales to the United States, of sales for export, and of sales of refined gold and silver.

This amendment provides for what is commonly known as a turnover tax on the sale of goods, wares, and merchandise, and would apply to every business coming within the definition, whether of a manufacturer, a wholesaler, or a retailer.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not sure that I understood the Senator. Does the Senator by his amendment propose to exempt from taxation goods sent abroad and to levy a tax on exactly the same character of goods if sold for domestic consumption?

Mr. SMOOT. That has been a principle which has always been incorporated into sales-tax bills.

Mr. REED. I just wanted to know if that was what the effect of the amendment would be.

Mr. SMOOT. If a sales tax is imposed on goods manufactured in the United States for exportation, then just that much expense is added to the cost of merchandise which will be exported and come in competition with merchandise made in foreign countries, and it is for that reason that all sales tax or manufacturers' tax or general turnover-tax measures which I have known anything about incorporate such a provision as this. In addition to that, it is unconstitutional to tax goods exported to a foreign country.

Mr. POMERENE. How much money does the Senator anticipate would be raised by this tax?

Mr. SMOOT. A tax of one-half of 1 per cent would raise $450,000,000, at the least; but in my opinion it would raise more money than that.

From the discussion yesterday, it is quite evident that a sales tax will be imposed in the very near future, and every criticism that has been offered to the administration of the manufacturers' tax, or which will be offered to the pending amendment, will apply next year, when it is said we will adopt a sales-tax bill, as much as it would apply to-day.

In my opinion, if the sales tax is to be imposed for the purpose of paying the soldiers' bonus, it ought to be put in operation as early as possible, so that there would be six months or three months or two months, if you please, to demonstrate the amount of money such a tax would bring into the Treasury of the United States monthly, and then, when the soldiers' bonus bill comes before this body, we would have, not an estimate, but a basis of calculation to determine what rate ought to be imposed in order to meet the payments which will be required if the bonus bill passes.

I have not a doubt in my mind, as I said some months ago, but that a bonus bill will be enacted into law. The junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] asked me in the Senate some months ago if I thought it would, and I told him then that I had no idea but that a bonus bill would be passed, and I have not changed my mind in that regard.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, has the change of front come about because of the resolution passed day before yesterday by the American Legion, condemning the President for asking for its recommitment and the majority party for their delay in passing it?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not changed my position or from my position when I made the statement months ago. I have said to everybody that there was not a question of doubt but that the bonus bill would be enacted into law.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House has, as was stated upon this floor, given out a statement that at the next session of Congress, before the month of July, the soldiers' bonus bill will be passed, as well as a bill imposing a sales tax to raise money to pay the bonus. At least, that is the import of his statement, and I put the exact statement in the RECORD yesterday. If that is true, why should we wait until next July? Why should not the soldiers' bonus bill be attached as an amendment to the Senator's provision for a sales tax and passed now?

I am not for the sales tax. I prefer paying the soldiers' bonus out of the profits of the profiteer to paying the soldiers' bonus out of a tax which he will have largely to pay himself, for he will largely have to pay the sales tax; but I do not care to argue that for the moment. If that is the purpose of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, who is now engaged in telling the Senate how to conduct its business, and who is criticizing Senators for their conduct on the floor, why does he not suggest that the purpose be carried out now, while we are engaged in enacting this legislation?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I am not in the confidence of Representative FORDNEY. He has never mentioned this subject to me in any way, shape, or form. All I know is what I saw in the paper, and I called the attention of the Senate to it yesterday in my remarks upon the manufacturers' sales tax.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON] has just made a succinct statement of the tax situation, and I believe that the American people from one end of this country to the other expected this Congress to relieve them of all the discriminatory, unjust, nagging taxes imposed by existing law. I believe that all the special war taxes ought to be repealed at the earliest date possible. That is the reason I ask that a sales tax be adopted. This amendment is simply to impose a tax of a half of 1 per cent upon goods, wares, and merchandise sold in the United States by the manufacturer, the wholesaler, or the retailer, and, as I stated, it will bring more money to the Treasury of the United States than the 1 per cent manufacturers' tax imposed.

I do not believe that there will be any change of sentiment in the Senate on account of anything I or others may say, and, as we have already voted upon the manufacturers' tax, I am perfectly willing to now take a vote upon the pending amendment.

I am quite sure, however, there are Senators who are in favor of this proposition in preference to the manufacturers' tax, and others favor the manufacturers' tax. I know also that the retailers of the country prefer this tax to the manufacturers' tax; but be that as it may, I shall ask for a yea-and-nay vote upon this pending amendment.

I will have the satisfaction of having the different forms of a sales tax in the RECORD. I have no doubt, as I said before, that a sales tax will be incorporated into our revenue laws, and the results of the labor I have put upon these amendments may be of use in the future, and I shall be content. I shall feel paid for all the hours of labor I have given to this subject when that happens.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I am not sure I understand how comprehensive the provisions of this amendment are and I desire to ask the Senator if this means that every time a sale is made by the manufacturer to the jobber, by the jobber to the retailer, and by the retailer to the consumer each of those sales will be subject to a tax?

Mr. SMOOT. That is the plan as outlined in the pending amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Then that would mean, for instance, that if the product of the United States Steel Corporation which passes from the virgin ore to its finished product as sold by the United States Steel Corporation there would be one sale or one tax; but if there were a number of sales by independent manufacturers passing from the owner of the mines to the furnace, from the furnace to the steel maker, and so on down, there might be three or four or five different taxes on the same product. Am I right?

Mr. SMOOT. The rate of tax is so small that the result——

Mr. POMERENE. It is one-half of 1 per cent.

Mr. SMOOT. The result, I will say to the Senator, would not be so great, particularly in the great bulk of the goods made and sold in the United States.

Mr. POMERENE. A tax of one-half of 1 per cent on the gross sales might spell the difference between prosperity and ruin. I will not state it that way. It might do away with the entire net profits of a concern.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not answer that charge made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] yesterday, but I will say to the Senator that it can be successfully answered. Where every manufacturer is treated alike, no matter whether it is 1 per cent or 2 per cent, no one manufacturer would have an advantage over another, and there will be no advantage under a sales tax imposed. The price of goods is regulated by competition, and as this would be a tax upon all alike it would be a part of the cost of all goods produced.

Mr. POMERENE. I do not think the Senator's statement meets the situation. Assuming that each of the two manufacturers put the product through the same processes, and so forth, then the Senator is right.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator had, no doubt, in mind the integrated and nonintegrated companies?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; that is one of the classes of taxpayers that I have in mind.

Mr. SMOOT. There is something in that, and I have an amendment to offer to take care of just such cases, and I intend to offer it when I have a chance. This is the amendment:

Every person taxable under this title shall be allowed as a credit in his monthly return the amount of taxes reimbursed by him to any other person with respect to the purchase of any goods, wares, or merchandise sold by the person claiming such credit, whether or not after further process of manufacture.

That will equalize the taxes to be paid by an integrated company and a nonintegrated company. The Senator, of course, points it out now, as I understand him. I had intended before I took my seat at this time to offer the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. I have not had an opportunity to consider the amendment which the Senator has now read and which he intends to propose. That in part, at least as I grasp it, would meet the situation; but I wish to see how comprehensive the proposition is, so let me ask another question or two. I assume that it is not intended to cover sales of insurance.

Mr. SMOOT. It is not. Insurance is not goods, wares, or merchandise.

Mr. POMERENE. Loosely speaking, they sometimes refer to it as selling goods.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator it does not include insurance.

Mr. POMERENE. I assumed that was the construction the Senator placed upon it. At the same time, while all dealers in merchandise are taxed under the bill, it is not intended to tax the professional man, such as the lawyer or the doctor.

Mr. SMOOT. Not at all. There is no imposition of a tax on service. It is the simpliest tax that could be levied, because it applies only to goods, wares, and merchandise.

Mr. POMERENE. It is simple, and therein, in my mind, lies one of the objections. The doctor or lawyer who renders his service and makes a charge for it is in fact charging for his goods. I realize that the one is technically called service and the other technically called goods or merchandise, yet both are interested and both ought to bear as nearly equitable as possible the same burden.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct in that statement, but we already tax personal services by way of taxing the incomes of all the professional men in the United States.

Mr. President, in order to perfect my amendment I send to the desk a modification thereof which I ask may be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). The Secretary will report the proposed modification of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 4, line 7, after the word "Title" and "(d)," insert the following:

(e) Every person taxable under this title shall be allowed as a credit in his monthly return the amount of taxes reimbursed by him to any other person with respect to the purchase of any goods, wares, or merchandise sold by the person claiming such credit, whether or not after further process of manufacture.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I wish very briefly to remove, if possible, a misapprehension that is prevalent throughout the country about the manufacturers' sales tax and the business sales tax, the latter tax plan being now before the Senate. I am sure many of us have been surprised at the flood of petitions and the persistent requests of many business men for the Congress to impose a tax upon their sales. In all my experience in public life I never before knew of men petitioning, arguing, contending, and demanding that an extra tax be placed upon themselves and their business. Mark what I say, an extra or additional tax, for that is what I contend this plan contemplates.

The business interests of the country and the manufacturing interests have been so annoyed and troubled and put to so much expense in hiring and retaining experts and lawyers to make out their tax returns under the present law, and are so uncertain as to their tax obligation that they have longed, hoped, and prayed for some new system of taxation which would be simple and direct. The advocates throughout the country of the sales tax are expecting and believe that the adoption of a sales tax law means the abolition of all other taxes and a simplification of our present complex tax system.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. That same statement was made upon the floor of the Senate yesterday by several Senators. Since yesterday I have seen representatives of manufacturers, at least those representatives who are located in the District of Columbia, claiming to represent concerns employing probably 5,000,000 men. They understand the bill as it was before this body yesterday as well as I understand it. They desire, as the Senator has said, to get rid of all forms of taxation that are discriminatory, one manufacturer being taxed upon what he makes and another manufacturer not taxed upon what he makes. They want all of that class of taxes to be eliminated from the revenue bill.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There may be some business men in the country who are content and willing to accept another tax, but I repeat that the great body of the manufacturing and business interests in America have assumed that the sales tax was a simple and direct substitute tax for the existing taxation system on business. The strength of the movement which has been led so ably and so intelligently by the Senator from Utah has been due to the fact that at last we were to get away from the complications of the present tax law and to have a simple sales tax; that the business men would no longer find it necessary to employ expert accountants to make out their tax returns and would no longer have to retain expert revenue lawyers to interpret the tax law; but that they would have a simple sales tax which would be a substitute for all other taxes.

Mr. SMOOT. And apply to all alike.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is no question about that. If a sales tax system could be devised which would eliminate from business the corporation taxes and all income taxes, it would have powerful support among many people throughout the country. But what are the facts? Not a single tax which is burdensome, complicated, or involved is eliminated by the amendment offered yesterday or by the amendment offered to-day by the Senator from Utah except a very few so-called nuisance taxes.

Every corporation tax which is provided for in the pending bill is retained. The normal tax upon personal incomes and the surtaxes on large incomes are both retained. All the expenses and inconveniences which business men have had to meet in the past in order to make their returns are retained. Business will still be subject to inspection of its books; there will still be an uncertainty as to whether or not individuals and corporations have settled in full with the Government; revenue inspectors will continue to call and make examinations of the books of business concerns and individuals, and the review and revision of tax returns will continue.

Mr. President, this sales amendment, stripped of all coloring, means simply this to the business men of this country: "In addition to your normal individual tax, in addition to your surtax, in addition to your corporation net income tax and your capital stock tax, in addition to every existing general tax, you are to have another tax; you are to make out another return, and you are to make it out each month. You are to be taxed on the gross sales in your business, and that business is to be further inspected, for the records of all your sales must be examined in order to ascertain whether or not your return has been correctly made out." I do not think for one moment that the business interests of this country realize that this is a move to impose one more tax upon business.

I repeat, every single general tax which now hangs over the individual, every burdensome and annoying tax which now hangs over corporations, and the business interests of this country is retained; and now in addition there is to be imposed a more sweeping tax than all of them, one under which every sale that a business house makes in this country is to be recorded, is to be subject to inspection, is to be subject to examination, and is to be subject to tax. That such tax proposal should be asked for by business is almost inconceivable.

The Senator from California pointed out the hope of the business men of this country, namely, that there would come a tax law out of this session of Congress which would simplify the present tax system; that there would be an end of the hiring of experts to make out returns; that there would be an end to the retaining of lawyers to interpret the law; that there would be an end to the never-ending discussion as to what are capital assets and what are capital gains and losses; as to what constitutes net income; as to what are taxable dividends; as to what are proper deductions and provable credits. The business men have expected that there would come out of this session of Congress a tax law which would be so simple that it could be easily interpreted, and that when the tax levied under it was paid they would know it to be a final termination of their tax obligation. Our business people have been disgusted and discouraged in finding that years after their taxes had been paid inspectors called at their places of business and examined their accounts for the purpose of trying to levy additional tax upon them. No man knows under the present law whether or not he is ever to be square with the Government.

Business men have hoped, I repeat, that there would come a simple tax system out of this Congress, and they seized upon this sales tax in the belief that it would accomplish it. Does the sales-tax amendment before us remove the complications of the present system and give to the country a simple and direct tax? I challenge the Senator from Utah or any other Senator who is in favor of the sales tax to point out one single general tax other than the so-called nuisance taxes which is eliminated from business under the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

What individual is going to be relieved? Who is going to be spared from paying a surtax? What corporation is to be excused from making returns for the purpose of taxing their net income? All the complications, all the intricacies, all the legal difficulties of the present law are retained, plus what? Plus, Mr. Business Man, another tax—one more tax, one more return—oh, no; 12 more returns, for a return of sales must be made each month. No longer will the Government be content to ascertain what you have received, what you have paid out, what your expenses have been, what your net income has been, but now it must know what your sales have been, and there will be another demand to "Let us see your books."

Mr. President, if the business interests of this country knew to just what this amendment would lead, their clamor for a sales tax would disappear like snow before the summer sun. The whole propaganda for a sales tax, I repeat, has been based upon the assumption that it would be a substitute for the burdensome taxes under the present law; but, in addition to being another tax, which, in truth, it is, it is the nuisance tax multiplied; it is the nuisance tax applied to every single business concern and in every purchase of merchandise. In a word, it is an amendment to reduce the nuisance taxes on certain luxuries from 3 and 5 per cent to one-half of 1 per cent, and to put a nuisance tax on every single business sale transaction in America. If a few luxury taxes at 3 or 5 per cent have been a nuisance, what are we to call and what language shall we use to describe a tax upon every sale made by every manufacturer, wholesaler, and retailer in America?

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts think that taxes on insurance companies are nuisance taxes? Such taxes by my amendment are repealed. Does the Senator think that the American people want to continue the payment of the stamp taxes of every name and nature? They are repealed by the amendment.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will say to the Senator from Utah that the American people prefer to endure stamp taxes and luxury taxes rather than have a tax put upon every single article which they buy, instead of the business man paying a tax on the sale of the luxuries in which he alone deals. I am not in sympathy with the so-called nuisance tax. I wish they could be all abolished; but if we are to have nuisance taxes, bad as they are, let us confine them to the sales of those articles of trade which are known as luxuries and which are used and purchased by those best able to pay a tax.

Mr. SMOOT. The luxury taxes of which the Senator from Massachusetts speaks which remain in the bill are simply insignificant. They are not the taxes which have been burdensome to the people. They are discriminatory taxes; there is no doubt about that, for there is a line of manufactured articles that pays a tax of from 5 to 10 per cent while other lines do not pay any tax; but the bulk of the taxes, of course, comes from other sources, as the Senator from Massachusetts knows.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think these taxes were called nuisance taxes because when a man went into a store to buy a pair of shoes or a suit of clothes the clerk informed him that there was a tax in addition to the regular price; and he was obliged to pay the regular price charged by the retailer plus the tax.

They were frequently called "nuisance" taxes because the small and large retail merchant had to keep books and make constant and regular reports to the Government as to what taxable goods he sold, what price was paid, and how much he owed the Government in taxes upon the sales which he made of these certain goods that bore a tax. They were called "nuisance" taxes because they involve a tax on small transactions and were a nuisance to the purchasing public as well as a nuisance to the retailer and the wholesaler, who had to keep records of the sales. I repeat that the sales tax, if adopted, will multiply the "nuisance" taxes, for it will impose a tax upon every sale, instead of upon a certain few sales that are covered by the present law, and it will compel every single business man in America to maintain another set of books for the inspection of Government tax officials in order to see if he is taxed fully and if he is making an honest tax return. The last amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah will require business men to hire another set of lawyers, because it involves complications that are so technical from the legal standpoint that it will be very difficult for the business man to know what deductions he is permitted to make.

Mr. SMOOT rose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I will yield in a few moments. I want to give full measure of credit to the Senator from Utah for his able efforts in this matter. He has in a very valuable and very helpful way contributed to the discussion of the tax question in this session of Congress. I appreciate as much as any Senator on this floor the time and attention, the thought and study, the Senator from Utah has given to this subject; but the whole proposition which he presents so ably and so well is based, so far as any support for it is concerned from the country at large, upon the assumption that other objectionable taxes were to be eliminated, that the tax burdens on business would be relieved, and we would have a simple, direct system of taxation, so that the individual or corporation would have only one tax bill, would have only one account with the Government, which would be upon sales, which everybody would accept in lieu of the present taxes which the corporations and business interests of the country have to pay.

Some one has described the popular notion of this sales tax as a tax to enable business to make a tax return on a single sheet of paper. What an awakening would come if this amendment should be adopted. Instead of single tax return this amendment proposed multiplies and increases tax returns, legal intricacies, and more accounting. It is not a substitute tax but a straight-out additional tax upon business.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, if I had had my way we would have repealed the excess-profits tax as of January 1, 1921. The Senator knows further that the complications involved in the tax returns come about by reason of the excess-profits taxes more than any other tax imposed by the law. I waited as I had to wait under the rules of the Senate until the committee amendments had been agreed to, and in the meantime the Senate decided that they would not repeal the excess-profits tax until January 1, 1922, so that that tax will remain in existence one year longer than I should like to see it remain.

In reference to the Senator's suggestion in regard to the objectionable feature involved in making returns as to sales monthly, I desire to say that there is not a business institution in America that does not know at the end of the month, without any further bookkeeping, just what its sales have been for that month. Anybody can simply compute one-half of 1 per cent on the amount thus shown and return it, the same as is done in Canada and other countries in which a sales tax is imposed. I understand that the Governments of nearly all of the leading European countries are adopting this means of raising revenue.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield, in order that I may ask a question of the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I gladly yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. As I understand, the amendment which is offered to the amendment of the Senator from Utah authorizes the ultimate seller to ask for a credit for such sales taxes as may have been paid theretofore by his vendor and others. Am I right about that?

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, in case the commodities enter into a further process of manufacture. The provision which the Senator has in mind only applies to a case like this, if the Senator from Massachusetts will excuse the interruption.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly, if it is not too long.

Mr. SMOOT. Take the United States Steel Corporation, which owns the mines from which it makes pig iron, and then makes billets and from the billets makes steel. It produces a finished product, which goes into the hands of its customers, no matter whether wholesalers, commission merchants, or retailers, or what not; and it would only have to pay one tax, because only one sale has occurred in connection with the goods, wares, and merchandise handled by it, because that corporation engages in all the processes of manufacture from the mines to the finished product.

Mr. POMERENE. Let us take the case of an independent company.

Mr. SMOOT. An independent company making the same goods would be taxed upon the ore; then the man who takes that ore and makes it into pig iron is to receive credit for whatever tax was charged to him by the concern producing the ore. Then, when he sells that pig iron to a steel manufacturer, the steel manufacturer is credited with whatever tax was paid by the man who manufactured the pig iron; so that in the end exactly the same taxes are imposed upon the nonintegrated company as are imposed upon the integrated company.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The inquiry is not only a very important one, but also a very interesting one, but evidently it will be of long duration. I want to finish my observations and will then yield the floor, to permit the very pertinent colloquy to continue.

Mr. POMERENE. I will not interrupt. I was going to ask another question, but I shall not do so.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I think really our consciences ought to trouble us concerning this vote, because when men go about begging for taxes they should be given them. I never have seen such propaganda and such insistent demand of a people to be taxed as I have in the petitions which have come to me from some of the most sound business interests of this country. What is the explanation? They do not know what this proposition is. They believe that it is a substitute for existing tax laws. That is the whole support of this sales-tax proposition—that their business will get rid of the present burdensome and annoying taxes, that they will have a simple sales tax.

I repeat, Mr. President, our consciences ought to trouble us. If men want, in addition to the personal income tax and surtaxes and all the different taxes upon corporations, a business tax on sales, it should be given them; but I fear they know not whereof they speak.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator means that if they could understand that this tax is in addition to those other taxes they would not ask for it?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. They would flood us with petitions of protest; and let me say to the Senator from North Carolina that when the proposition comes here, as was suggested yesterday, to levy a sales tax to pay the bonus due our soldiers these very petitioners for a sales tax will denounce it, denounce the principle of a sales tax, and denounce it bitterly and severely, on the ground that it is another burden on business. I suggest, Mr. President, that we watch the votes which will be recorded in the Senate on this question, and we will find some of the very men who now most loudly advocate the sales tax voting against the sales tax amendment when it is to be used for the purpose of creating a fund to pay a bonus to the soldiers who so well deserve it. When such a proposition is before us some of the Senators now advocating a sales tax will be making the very speech I am now making against its adoption.

Mr. President, it is preposterous. I recognize that there is merit in this proposition if there could be devised a sales tax which would eliminate the present burdensome taxes of this country; but the trouble with this proposition is that you do not relieve at all the present burdensome and annoying taxes. You are simply adding to them, and you are asking the business interests of the country to pay another tax, to make out more tax returns, to retain more lawyers, and to hire more expert accountants. The present amendment is even more objectionable than the one offered yesterday by the Senator, because it reaches out and taxes not only manufacturers' sales but every sale.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that the amendment of the Senator from Utah will reduce the taxes of the corporations of this country $140,000,000 and put them on somebody else.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the Senator had come into the Chamber a little earlier, he would have heard me say that I was not developing the question of whether the amendment reduced taxes or not. My claim was that the same complicated and intricate provisions of the present law still remain, and that a corporation, whether it was paying 10 or 15 per cent, would have to make out its returns in the same manner that they are made out under the present law, because the present questions of net gain and net loss and of capital gain and capital loss and of taxable dividends—all those entangling questions that have raised so many legal questions are still presented and still retained, and there has been no simplification whatever of the war tax law that has been in operation since the war.

Mr. President, I am not going to say more except to point out the fact that this amendment is more objectionable than the other one, because it reaches out and taxes every single transaction, and it embraces a larger number of business concerns than the amendment offered by the Senator on yesterday.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I am sure the Senator has called attention to the fact that the average turnover in the United States—and this is a turnover tax—is three, and this, therefore, would be practically a tax of 1½ per cent.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator from North Carolina for his suggestion. The amendment of yesterday had at least the merit of not being a turnover tax; it was a direct manufacturers' sales tax.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It was a manufacturers' sales tax; but this amendment is a pure and simple turnover tax, and means just what the Senator from North Carolina has pointed out—that in the average merchandise transaction it will amount to a tax of 1½ per cent—in many cases the turnover will be six or seven times. It is a tax that can be passed on and a tax that will be a nuisance to everybody who buys any "goods, wares, or merchandise" in the country. It will prove an added nuisance to the business interests of this country, which must keep new accounts, meet new tax obligations, and pay a tax bill in addition to the tax bills that they have to meet at present.

Mr. President, I have not attempted to develop the objections to this sales tax from the consumer's standpoint, as that was discussed fully in the debate of yesterday. I leave the question to the Senate, with merely the presentation of the burden and hardship the sales tax will impose upon the business and manufacturing interests of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SPENCER in the chair). The question is upon the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. SMOOT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. EDGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]. I have not been able to get a transfer for the moment, so for the present I will withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], but I am informed that if present that Senator would vote the same way that I shall vote, and I therefore am at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], but I understand that if he were present he would vote as I shall vote, and therefore I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. He is absent, but upon this amendment I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. FLETCHER. I have a general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL], which I transfer to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], and will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PITTMAN. I have been requested to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY]. If he were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (after having voted in the negative). I observe from the announcement of the roll call that the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is absent. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. KELLOGG] is necessarily absent.

Mr. HARRISON. I am paired with the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY];

So Mr. SMOOT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I offer two amendments to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, on page 76, line 13, after the word "included" I move to strike out the balance of the paragraph down to and including the word "months," on line 17. This amendment is offered because of the fact that the same matter is provided for in the succeeding paragraph, and if both provisions are left in there will be a double credit allowed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 76, line 13, after the word "included," strike out the semicolon and all down to and including the words "twelve months" on line 17.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 7, line 18, after the period insert the following:

If any such tax free distribution has been made—

(1) The distributee shall not be allowed as a deduction from gross income any loss sustained from the sale or other disposition of his stock or shares acquired prior to March 1, 1913, unless, and then only to the extent that, the basis provided in section 202 exceeds the sum of (a) the amount realized from the sale or other disposition of such stock or shares, and (b) the aggregate amount of such distributions received by him thereon; and

(2) Where the distributee has acquired his stock or shares since February 28, 1913, the amount so distributed to him shall be applied against and reduce the basis provided in section 202 for ascertaining the gain derived or loss sustained from the sale or other disposition of such stock or shares.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have not examined the amendment, and I would like to have the Senator explain just what its effect would be.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, there are two purposes to be served by this amendment. It relates to the question of the distribution of earnings acquired or which accrued prior to March 1, 1913. It involves in a different way the question which was disposed of early in the consideration of the bill, when the committee amendment was defeated which proposed to tax as gains, or to be included under the gain and loss account, distributions made subsequent to March 1, 1913, of earnings accumulated prior to that time.

That amendment was defeated. I voted for its rejection, but I stated at that time that under existing law there were two serious leaks in the present law which it seemed to me no one could defend. One of them is that if there is stock valued on March 1, 1913, at $200, we will say, $100 of which is made up of earnings accumulated prior to that time, $100 being the principal, if after that time the stockholder who owned it on March 1, 1913, receives a distribution of $100 and then sells his stock for $100, it is clear that he has every dollar there was in that stock; but under existing law he is permitted to deduct a loss of $100, when, as a matter of fact, there is not a loss of a single penny. The Government is losing millions of revenue because of that situation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think the amendment as agreed to by the Senate goes even further than the Senator states in the case just recited. I think that if the stock was worth $100 on March 1, 1913, and they had accumulated earnings upon the stock of $100, until it was worth $200, and then they declared a dividend of $100, under the provision adopted by the Senate the owner would not pay even a cent of tax upon the $100 he had received in addition to what he had on March 1, 1913.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. So far as I have been able to learn no one questions that the situation is as I have presented it, and, as far as I know, no one has objected to this part of the amendment, which will cure that, because if this amendment is adopted, when the stockholder comes to sell his stock he will not be permitted to deduct a loss unless the price which he receives for the stock, plus the distribution of earnings prior to March 1, 1913, shall indeed show a loss. Certainly no one can object to that part of the amendment.

To the other part of the amendment I understand there is some objection. The second subdivision provides that where the distributee acquired his stock or shares since February 28, 1913, and afterwards sells it, if in the meantime he has received a distribution of earnings which accrued prior to March 1, 1913, not only is he not permitted to deduct a loss where none exists but he is compelled to account for that distribution, which is really capital, for gain as well as loss.

I can not see how anyone can object to this proposition. The objection to the original committee proposition, which I think was well taken, was this, that if a man owned stock on March 1, 1913, he may have been absolutely convinced that it was worth $200, he may have had a better knowledge of its value than anybody else, and yet, because of some forced sale of small portions of stock, or because of a valuation placed on the stock by some official of the Treasury Department of $100 on March 1, 1913, under the committee amendment he would have been compelled to count as a gain the difference between the $100 and the $200, when, as a matter of fact, there was no gain at all. But in the case of the man who has bought his stock since March 1, 1913, there is no theoretical gain so far as he is concerned. He knows what he paid for his stock. He received the current dividends from year to year, which have been distributed to him since his purchase, and if he received a distribution of earnings prior to March 1, 1913, he has received a distribution of an element of value of the stock he purchased, and which he paid for.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not had time to look closely into the amendment, but would not the first provision take care of a case like that, so that the Government would not lose any revenue? If on March 1, 1913, the stock was worth $100, and the original owner of the stock, after March 1, 1913, sold it for $200, $100 a share would be taxable under the first provision of the Senator's amendment?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but he might in fact have made a gain, and the gain would not be taxable.

Mr. SMOOT. Not under the first provision of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Because that relates only to the deduction of losses.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me, I think on account of the defeat of the committee amendment, some such amendment as is suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin should go in the bill. The experts have examined his amendment, and approve it as a very proper amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I say frankly that I want it to go in. I was wondering whether it was quite broad enough.

Mr. LENROOT. If I may just proceed a moment further, the Senator will see what its effect would be.

If one who purchased stock since March 1, 1913, sells that stock, and has received a distribution of earnings accrued prior to March 1, 1913, under my amendment, in accounting for gain and loss, he must add to the price he receives for his stock the amount of the distribution, which he is not compelled to do under the existing law.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe Senators understood fully the effect of the committee amendment when they voted on it as they did. But I will say that if we keep in the bill the provision as agreed to in the Senate, then the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin goes as far as we could go. But I would like to go further than that. I would like to have a reconsideration of the vote by which the committee amendment was adopted, and I say that the Treasury of the United States is protected as the committee originally undertook to have the bill read.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the logic of the Senator from Wisconsin is incontrovertible; but there is a question of equity which would arise which he apparently has overlooked. So long as the distributee holds the stock, of course, he is perfectly protected; but in the event that for any reason he has to sell he has a property right in the accumulated surplus of the company which he can not pass on, and a loss must take place.

It seems to me that the provision as it stands at the moment in the printed form submitted by the Senator from Wisconsin is in violation of certain contracts entered into through statutory means with the holders of the stock; that is to say, here is a situation which has been existing ever since the 1st of March, 1913, and we now purpose by statute to overturn it and to deprive the owners of this stock and of this property and the owners of their proper share of this accumulative property of the company, of their interest in it. In other words, we are going back to make a tax in effect upon capital accumulated prior to March 1, 1913, and it seems to me that in all fairness and equity that should be done away with.

I understand perfectly that individuals have to submit to the law, but I think there is a great element of inequity in changing the law so as to make it retroactive in its effect. If the Senator from Wisconsin could find it in his way to agree to a perfection of his amendment by saying, on the eleventh line of page 1, the words "since February 28, 1913," should be stricken out and there should be inserted in their place the words "subsequent to the passage of this act," no inequity whatever could take place, because every holder of this stock would then be put upon notice, and that is not the fact now. I ask the Senator if he will not accept that change in the language?

Mr. LENROOT. I can not accept it, but if the Senator chooses to offer it as an amendment to my amendment I certainly shall have no objection to its being so offered. I will say in that connection that the Senator has now presented the only possible objection that can be made, but to my mind I do not see, I am frank to say, the force of the objection. As the amendment now stands, we are not taking any capital or income accrued prior to March 1, 1913. Why, again using the same illustration, here is stock for which a man pays $200, $100 of which comprises value made up of accumulated earnings, and then he gets the distribution of $100 of those accumulated earnings and then sells the stock for $100. There is not one penny of tax on that at all.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I have here Bulletin No. 43–21 with reference to this particular matter, issued October 26, 1921, by the Bureau of Internal Revenue. This applies to the existing law. If the Senator will permit me, I think we might save a little time by presenting this matter now.

Mr. LENROOT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Here is the case upon which the decision was argued. I read two brief paragraphs:

> To illustrate the point, the M corporation purchased capital assets in 1910 for $10,000. On March 1, 1913, these assets had a value of $20,000. In the year 1918, or a subsequent year, the M corporation sells these assets for $20,000 and distributes the $10,000 realized gain to its stockholders as dividends. The question asked is whether the $10,000 thus distributed is taxable as income to the stockholders.

The decision answers that, and before I read it I wish to go over the figures again. These stocks were purchased for $10,000 in 1910 and on March 1, 1913, the assets had a value of $20,000.

In the year 1918 this party sells the identical stock for $20,000. This is a case, by the way, submitted under the existing law. Here is the decision rendered under such a state of facts:

> For the reasons above stated it is concluded that profit made by a corporation in 1918 or subsequent years from the realization of appreciation of corporate assets accrued before March 1, 1913, is taxable income to the stockholder when distributed as a dividend in 1918 or subsequent years.

Now, it would appear to me that that is a clear misinterpretation of the existing statute. The property was acquired in 1910 for $10,000. On March 1, 1913, its value was $20,000, and in 1918 the stock was sold for $20,000, and still under the existing statute, as I interpret this, because the decision was rendered in October, 1921.

Mr. HARRISON. That is the opinion of the Treasury Department? It is not the opinion of any court?

Mr. BROUSSARD. No; it comes from the Treasury Department. It would seem to me that the interpretation of existing law is very much broader even than the amendment which the Senator from Wisconsin proposes. I have no doubt that when this opinion is taken to court it will not stand, because under the facts admitted, as I understand the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, there would be no tax due in such a case under the Senator's amendment. Is not that correct?

Mr. LENROOT. There would be no tax paid at all.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Therefore, it would seem that if the intention of the Senator from Wisconsin is to set at rest the meaning of the existing statute, the Senator should first insert something in his amendment in order to make it known to the Treasury Department that the amendment offered by him is merely for the purpose of interpreting the existing law; otherwise, if that were not stated, the Treasury Department might take the position that any distribution of funds or transaction in stock made prior to the enactment of the amendment which is proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin is taxable under the decision to which I have just referred. I think no one before this decision ever believed such a case would present a just claim on the part of the Government to ask for a tax on income.

I would like to have the Senator from Wisconsin discuss that if he sees fit to do so.

Mr. LENROOT. I am familiar with that decision. The decision is one that relates wholly to appreciation of assets. It has nothing to do with actual earnings or profits accumulated. The department does hold that under existing law the appreciation of assets not realized prior to March 1, 1913, is not covered by exemption, but my amendment has nothing to do with that question. I apprehend that before the bill leaves the Senate there will be an amendment offered to cover the point made by the decision, so that the law clearly will cover any question of earnings actually accumulated or gain actually arising out of appreciation of assets, so that there will be no distribution taxable where it was distributed subsequent to March 1, 1913, in any case where the appreciation or earnings have been accumulated prior to that date.

But my amendment has nothing to do with that question because, entirely irrespective of that question, the deduction of losses will continue in the law even if that particular point is amended to cover or meet the decision made by the solicitor.

As I said, there are two purposes in the amendment, one to prevent a deduction of loss where there is no loss and the other to permit the taxation of a gain where there is actually a gain. That is all.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. If the provision reported from the Finance Committee were to obtain, or were to be restored, as I understand we have stricken it out, to what extent then would the amendment just tendered by the Senator from Wisconsin be needed in order to effectuate his object?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. If the original committee amendment should be adopted, then mine should be rejected, because the committee amendment goes so much further than mine does. In other words, it covers all the ground of this amendment and a great deal more besides.

Mr. KING. Is the Senator satisfied with the committee amendment? Does the Senator think it goes too far?

Mr. LENROOT. I think it goes too far. I think it compels a man who owned stock on March 1, 1913, to accept the valuation of somebody else when he had a better knowledge of its value and wanted to keep it, because his judgment of what those accumulated profits and earnings were was better than that of somebody else. He ought not to be compelled to be taxed upon a theoretical gain, based upon the judgment of somebody else, when he was willing to retain his stock and run the chance himself of it being a gain. That is my objection to the committee amendment.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If the Senator will permit me, it would be the judgment of somebody else arrived at many years after the transaction, when subsequent events may justify a different conclusion.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true. But no such objection can be made to the amendment I have now offered—no question of valuation, no question of theoretical gain. It is a question of how much a man pays for his stock, how much he sells it for, and how much he has received in the meantime of accumulated earnings.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator does not hold that it is necessary to offer both of his proposals at the same time or that one is a necessary part of the other, does he? Would not the Senator be willing to separate the amendment and vote upon paragraph 1 and paragraph 2 separately?

Mr. LENROOT. One is dependent upon the other to this extent: They deal, of course, with the same state of facts. The first part of the amendment covers all stockholders who owned their stock on March 1, 1913, and continue to own it. The second part of the amendment covers only stockholders who acquired their stock subsequent to March 1, 1913; but if the second part of the amendment should be rejected and the first part adopted, it would leave those losses to be deducted by the men who acquired their stock subsequent to March 1, 1913, and would not permit the man who owned his stock on March 1, 1913, to make a similar deduction.

Mr. MOSES. He would still have to go back to the same state of facts.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, I discussed this question rather briefly the other day and I do not intend to take much of the time of the Senate for further discussion. By a very decisive vote the Senate, in Committee of the Whole, decided the question some days ago, and I thought conclusively, fixing the time for the operation of the income tax on gains and profits as the 1st day of March, 1913. But for some reason the question continues to arise; and the reason evidently is that there are gentlemen in the Treasury Department and gentlemen in the Senate who believe that the taxing power of the Government ought to reach behind the 1st day of March, 1913, to accumulate income taxes for the benefit of the Government. That is evident from the decision to which the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] just referred, and which I hold in my hand.

Mr. President, I had personally something to do with this legislation in its initial stages. There is no doubt in the world that the men who wrote the original bill and the Congress when they enacted it—at least a majority of the Congress—were attempting to fix the status of the property throughout the United States so that the power to tax the increase—no matter what it was, earnings, profits on unearned increment—should begin on March 1, 1913, and that before that time it should be exempt. I do not think that there is a doubt in the world that that was the original intention. Of course, the recent decision of the Treasury Department puts a different interpretation on the case; but, to my mind, it is clearly not the interpretation which is proper if the viewpoint of the men who passed the legislation has any weight in the decision of the question.

Mr. LENROOT. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to say that I entirely agree with the Senator as to the intent that all accumulated earnings prior to March 1, 1913, should be free the same as capital.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the Senator include in that statement what the Treasury Department in its decision calls the "unearned increment"?

Mr. LENROOT. I should suppose so. I was very much surprised at the decision, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am glad the Senator from Wisconsin agrees with me about it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say, if the Senator from Alabama will allow me, that there is an amendment which has been prepared, and which the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the other House has asked me to offer, which is intended to cure what he regards and what many Senators regard as a defect in the law as to unearned increment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I shall be obliged, if the Senator from North Dakota does not object, if he will send the amendment to the desk and let it be read now before I finish my remarks, as I should like to know the committee's view.

Mr. McCUMBER. The amendment which has been handed to me is as follows:

On page 7, line 14, after the word "accumulated," to insert "or increase in value of property accrued."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that language covers it—"or increase in value of property accrued."

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That undoubtedly would cover the unearned increment. I should be very glad to support the amendment when the opportunity comes, and hope that it will be adopted. I shall not detain the Senate longer, as the acting chairman of the committee proposes to offer the amendment, which I think goes to the real merit of the case, except to say that if the Congress should accept the decision of the Treasury Department in this matter, taking the viewpoint that when we used the words "earnings or profits accumulated prior to March 1, 1913," we did not mean the unearned increment, and it should not be included in this legislation, we would thereby harass the American people almost as greatly as they would be harassed by a war.

Just visualize the situation for a moment. Here is a man who bought a piece of city property, say in 1900, for $100,000. In 1913 it had increased in value to $200,000. Now, eight or nine years have run by and the time comes for him to sell that property. He sells it for $200,000. The entire increase in value occurred before the income tax amendment to the Constitution was adopted by the people of the United States; and yet it is proposed to go back and apply the heavy and severe taxes growing out of the recent war to the accumulations which came to him by the increased value of his property. Such action might halfway destroy an estate.

Of course, I realize that there are those who believe in the theory of government and the theory of taxation that no man is entitled to the unearned increment of his property; that if he was fortunate enough to buy a lot close to a growing town and it becomes a city and he finds himself in his old age with a piece of city property in his possession instead of a country town lot, the increased value of the property does not belong to him because he did not earn it. Of course, he earned it by paying taxes on it, by holding it, by using it. I will not go into that theory; it is not a theory to which I subscribe; but if the Congress of the United States is going to adopt the theory that the unearned increment does not belong to the citizen, let us do so as a matter of legislative policy and not by backing up an ill-considered decision of the Treasury Department.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, inasmuch as I have stated the sole objection which could be offered against the amendment which has been proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], and since that Senator has intimated that he will make a feebler resistance than he ordinarily displays on a proposition which he opposes on the floor to the amendment which I am about to offer to his amendment, I now move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin in line 11, on the first page, by striking out the words "since February 28, 1913," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "subsequent to the passage of this act."

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I discussed very briefly this matter when it was under consideration in connection with the amendment offered by the majority of the committee. I stated at that time—and I wish to repeat very briefly what I then said—that I can not distinguish between the original investment and the accrued and undivided profits which were on hand on March 1, 1913. If there was $100 invested originally on that date and the assets would justify a value of $200 per share, all of that, in my opinion, is necessarily capital, because the Congress can not take the position because on February 28, 1913, the $100 was not distributed and thereby would escape future taxation except when reinvested that that would distinguish it from the undivided profits. I think that all of it is capital. Under what theory does the Congress pretend that it is just to reach back of March 1, 1913, and to apply the income tax principle to one of the hundred dollars, when both of them are capital? If no tax may be levied against the original investment, as that investment and the accretion are not distinguishable one from the other, and both are capital, both of them should be exempt and be tax free from any subsequent tax.

The $100 of undivided profits has remained in the corporation; it has produced revenue, and that revenue produced from that $100 of undivided profits had to pay a tax the same as the other and original investment of $100, and there is no period when you can stop and say, "This is the $100 that must be taxed and this is the $100 that should be exempted because it was the original investment." That is absolutely impossible, so that, Mr. President, it would appear to me that when the Congress decided that for the purpose of assessing the income tax the value of the property as of March 1, 1913, was absolutely correct, and any attempt to go back of that under any excuse or theory is a violation of that correct principle.

Let us see how we are treating people who have accepted the decision of Congress with reference to the date named as the basis for the imposition of this tax.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before proceeding to that, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the Senator's position is that any of the earnings which are undistributed and were undistributed on the 28th of February, 1913, are to be treated as capital. Suppose the corporation and the stockholders refused to consider them as capital for the purpose of the business or of the activities of the business and carried them along as undivided profits and later distributed them as a dividend or as undivided profits. I am not clear as to what the Senator's position is, as to whether any part of it should be exempt from taxation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. The statement of the Senator is inconsistent with the position taken by the Congress, because on March 1, 1913, all the undivided profits became capital and thereafter it was as much capital as the original investment. That is my theory of it. Everything that was there and belonged to the assets of the corporation was capital.

Mr. KING. The Senator misunderstands me. I am taking no position. I understood the Senator to take the position that it was capital.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. KING. Then, I said supposing—and I am inclined to think the Senator's position is right—that the corporation and the stockholders persistently refused to regard it as capital, but treated it as undivided profits held in the treasury for distribution and subsequently distributed it, I was not sure what the Senator's position then was.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If I understand the Senator from Utah on this proposition, the question would lead one to believe that after March 1, 1913, there was still undistributed profits and capital, although he admits that everything on that date was capital. It is not earnings acquired since March 1; it is the distribution of the capital of the corporation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, that is practically the theory of this amendment; that it is a distribution of capital in such cases; but if a corporation reduces its capital by a dividend of one-half of the amount, should not the stockholder be compelled to account for that distribution when he wants to sell his stock, because then he has received for his capital the amount he sells plus the distribution of the capital? That is all the amendment does.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let me ask a question. Is not this substantially the amendment that was defeated the other day?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all.

Mr. REED. What is the difference?

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator from Louisiana will yield——

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. As I have tried to explain two or three times, in the first place the amendment defeated the other day compelled a man who held stock on March 1, 1913, to accept a theoretical valuation of that stock made by the Treasury Department, either through perhaps a forced sale of a few shares or their own judgment of the value, when the stockholder may have known, because of his better knowledge that the value of that stock was very much greater than that; yet, under the committee amendment, he would be compelled to accept the Treasury valuation and account for a gain when he sold his stock when in fact there was no gain at all. Under my amendment, that can not happen.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. REED. I think perhaps we can get to the point of this matter in this way more quickly than we can by making long speeches. Under the amendment which was defeated, if A owned stock in a company, and it had accumulated a surplus before March, 1913, and he continued to hold his stock and received his distributive dividends upon it, and then sold his stock, he was entitled to sell it and get whatever he could for it in the market, and there was no tax put upon him for that transaction, as I understand.

Mr. LENROOT. That is true.

Mr. REED. But if he bought his stock subsequently to March, 1913, when they came to fix his taxes or his gains they deducted from the price he had paid any dividends he had received, and then taxed him for the gains in the price of the stock. That, it seems to me, is the very thing that is done under the last clause of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. That probably would be so; and the defect I have been trying to cure by the amendment which I have offered and which is now pending is to make that applicable from the date of the passage of this act, if we are to adopt the principle that accumulations made prior to the 1st of March, 1913, and which I regard as capital, are now to be taxable. Of course, generally speaking, I do not agree to that theory.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, if the Senator will let me butt into this general conversation, I shall be obliged.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes; everybody seems to be having a say, and I yield to the Senator.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think the difficulty in the situation is that in the amendments that have been proposed by the committee, which go further than the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin and enforce his amendment, they are trying to fix the status of the property on the ownership of the individual, whereas the ownership of the individual ought to have nothing whatever to do with it. The status of the property on the 1st day of March, 1913, ought to establish the whole situation.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Absolutely.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Therefore, we ought not to consider these amendments.

Mr. MOSES. The attempt, if I get the Senator's point, is to change the policy which was established by the statute which the Senator had a part in framing eight years ago, and to set up now the doctrine that this accumulated capital may be taxed—a doctrine to which I do not subscribe.

Mr. FLETCHER. To make the law retroactive, in other words.

Mr. MOSES. Yes.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, I desire to conclude my remarks, and I refuse to yield further.

It would appear to me that the situation that is presented here by the explanation of the Senator from Wisconsin in justification for offering this amendment is already covered under the present law, because if we accept as a basis the valuation of the property on March 1, 1913, then we may treat any transaction dealing with these stocks just as though we were buying any other sort of property, such as real estate or any other property which might be bought one day and sold the next day. The Government, under the present law, reserves the right upon the making of that return to investigate the true value, and it does that very thing, so that there is no reason to go back of March 1, 1913, in any instance; but here is the injustice that I desire to call to the minds of Senators:

It has been established by the Congress under this income tax law that the valuation of property as of date March 1, 1913, was to be the basis, and that everything belonging to a corporation on that date was capital. People have been buying stocks ever since, and they have acquired these stocks under the assumption that the Congress had decided something permanently, and there was no discount to cover this tax in these transactions up to this time. If a man wanted to buy stock he acquired it, say, at $300 a share, and if he sold it for $400 he made a return for a profit of $100, never taking into consideration any of the earnings which had accrued prior to March 1, 1913, because the Congress had very equitably decided that everything was to be valued as of date March 1, 1913. If the Congress is about to change its mind now, after all these transactions have been taking place since March 1, 1913, and people in good faith have acquired these stocks, and then they are about to dispose of them, and there is a question as to whether or not the Government will go back so as to find out what the undivided profits were before March 1, 1913, my opinion is that we are going to interfere with transactions which have been made under the law in good faith, and for that reason I think we should permit the law to remain as it is.

There is just one other fact that I want to call the attention of Senators to before I conclude.

We find that a decision was rendered here on October 26, 1921, with reference to this very subject under the existing law, so that we are convinced now that it takes years for the Treasury Department to get at a correct interpretation of a law. Everybody on this floor, I think, will dissent from that opinion. I do not think any Senator on this floor would hold that that is a correct opinion, and still the Treasury Department has been working on this very subject now for several years, and the business people of this country are not yet acquainted with what the Treasury Department will hold to be the meaning and the intent of Congress with reference to this particular question. Therefore, when the question is on its way for a definite settlement—because I am certain that this decision will be taken into the courts and will be reversed—why should we reopen it by changing it, and, by inference, indicating that the Congress has some desire to go back of the principle which it has established as the basis for the computation of income-tax returns as of March 1, 1913?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. If there is one principle that is found in the present law that everyone admits is wrong—and I want to say to the Senator that I have not heard any of the interested parties who are about this Capitol who do not admit that it is wrong—does the Senator say that such a wrong should not be corrected?

Mr. BROUSSARD. What wrong is that?

Mr. LENROOT. The deduction of so-called losses that is permitted now, where everyone admits there is no loss.

Mr. BROUSSARD. If the Senator wants to cure that, as I have said before, and as the Senator himself has stated, there is very little objection to that feature of it; but the second matter, which is coupled with that, is very objectionable.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator has just said that we must not disturb this.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I think that the Treasury Department, in interpreting the very law which the Senator seeks to correct, has taken a view which is decidedly beyond anything that the Senator has in mind, and when the question comes up before the courts the courts will establish what the intention of the Congress was, and in those cases will most probably decide as the Senator is providing in this very amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but that has nothing to do with this case, and I am going to vote for an amendment that will cure the situation with respect to this case at another place in the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I confess that this is a troublesome and somewhat puzzling thing to follow; but, if I see it aright, the second part of the Senator's amendment puts us back just where we were with the amendment which was offered and defeated.

I shall be very brief about this if I can have the attention of the Senate. To state the matter it is necessary to go back just a little.

First, we all seem to agree that property in the treasury of a corporation in the form of a surplus or in any other form on March 1, 1913, was capital; and it is agreed that, being capital, it should not be taxed now. It is therefore proposed that if A owned stock in that corporation before March 1, 1913, and continues to hold it, if there is a distributive dividend declared, he receives the distributive dividend; and if he afterwards sells his stock, the fact that he received the distributive dividend has nothing to do with the transaction. Whatever he sells his stock for he is entitled to take and keep, and he does not account for it at all. I think I am correct about that.

We come now to a second proposition. B buys this stock before the dividend has been declared, but buys it after March 1, 1913. He receives the same dividend that A received; but when he comes to sell his stock they ascertain the price he paid, they subtract from that the dividend he received, and if, then, he has made a profit between the price he paid, as reduced by the dividend received and the price for which he sold, they charge him a tax upon that profit.

Let us make that a very simple illustration.

A owned 10 shares of the par value of $1,000 in a corporation. It had a surplus on hand of 100 per cent on March 1, 1913. Subsequent to March 1 a thousand dollars dividend is handed to A, and subsequent to that he sells his share of stock for $1,500. He pays no taxes.

But B made a good bargain subsequent to March 1, 1913. He bought his share of stock for a thousand dollars, its face value. He receives the same dividend on that stock that A received. He sells his stock for $1,500. He has back his thousand dollars, and he pays a tax on $500, which represents his gain over the price he paid.

Do not Senators see what the effect of that is when we trace it clear back? It applies to the man who purchases the stock subsequent to March 1, 1913, an entirely different basis of taxation from that which it applies to the man who held the stock throughout, because the man who held it throughout pays no taxes whatsoever on his transaction, but the man who purchased pays a tax measured by the distributive dividend being subtracted from the price he paid, and the profit ascertained in that way.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. REED. I will yield in a moment; but let me follow that through. I would yield now, but I think I can add to the clarity of my statement.

Senators ask why is not that just. It is not just because it deprives the purchaser of this stock of the thing he purchased. If he got a thousand dollars' worth of stock, and the institution was capitalized at $10,000, the thing he purchased was one-tenth of the assets of that concern. If the assets instead of being $10,000, the face of the stock, are by reason of an accumulation $20,000, then he acquired $2,000 worth of property, although he paid only a thousand dollars for it. So you propose to tax him because he made a good bargain, but what are you in fact doing? You are taxing just the same in the case of B as in the case of A the accumulations of the corporation made prior to March 1, 1913, and which are distributed to him exactly as they are to A.

You may say that is all right as to this purchaser, but what is the effect upon the owner of the stock who owned it on March 1, 1913, and who is compelled to sell it? He is entitled to sell that stock and to get for it as near the value as he possibly can. But when he sells it the purchaser knows that if he dies and there is a dividend declared that will be subtracted from the purchase price and his estate will be taxed on any profit which may be made. Accordingly, he simply refuses to buy that stock, or he cuts the price so that he can recoup for the taxes which he pays. So in fact you are taxing the stockholder who can not hold his stock, because you are attaching a handicap to his stock when he sells it, but the man who can hold throughout the entire transaction does not pay any tax at all.

If I am a very wealthy individual and able to hold my stock, I pay no tax, but if you are pressed for money and must sell, when you go to sell your stock is handicapped by the fact that it will be taxed when it is sold upon the profits which you make, and those profits are ascertained by deducting the proportion of capital which had been accumulated prior to March 1, 1913, which was distributed to you. It is in fact taxing that capital. So I think the second clause of this amendment brings us exactly to where we were with the amendment which was defeated the other day by an overwhelming vote.

Take this case: A is able to hold his stock; B dies and his stock goes into his estate. In the liquidation of the estate the stock must be sold. The Senator from Wisconsin is in the market for some of that stock, but when he goes to buy it he says to the executor, "If I buy this stock and pay you $1,000 or $1,500 for it, and there is a dividend declared, they will take that distributed dividend and subtract it from the price paid you. I have to take that into account, and I can not pay you as much for that stock as I would pay if there were no such condition attached."

Mr. SWANSON. Would the dividends accumulated prior to March 1, 1913, be subtracted?

Mr. LENROOT. That is the very dividend I am talking about.

Mr. SWANSON. Would they not be segregated from dividends subsequently accumulated? As I understand it, it has been uniformly held by the courts that accumulations distributed prior to March 1, 1913, are not subject to the income tax.

Mr. LENROOT. They are not subject to taxation at all.

Mr. SWANSON. This is an amendment providing that where a purchase of stock was made after 1913, and accumulations prior to 1913 are distributed, they are subject to taxation?

Mr. LENROOT. No; they must be included when the man again sells his stock to ascertain his loss or gain.

Mr. REED. The thing he bought was an interest in the accumulated capital.

Mr. LENROOT. It was capital.

Mr. REED. It was capital.

Mr. LENROOT. I will not interrupt the Senator further at this time.

Mr. REED. I am perfectly willing to have the Senator interrupt me now. I only want to get this question straight. I am sure none of us has any interest in it except to have the matter straightened out. But this is the very question we fought over the other day. The first clause of the Senator's amendment is a modification of one phase, but this question is just the question that we discussed.

Mr. LENROOT. If the Senator will permit me, it is not the question at all. The question we discussed the other day was that of compelling a man who owned stock on March 1, 1913, to include a gain which was only a gain because some official of the Treasury Department valued his stock on March 1, 1913, at a certain figure, when in fact there was no gain at all. That is what we discussed the other day. The pending proposition is one which cuts out any possibility of theoretical gain, treats every dollar of earnings prior to March 1, 1913, as capital, as it is, but merely compels the man who has bought since March 1, 1913, to account for it as loss or gain upon capital. I have not yet heard anyone give upon this floor any reason why it should be treated as loss or gain upon capital.

The Senator from Missouri gives an illustration in which he says that A owns his stock on March 1, 1913, he receives a distribution, he sells, and he is not taxed; B buys his stock subsequent to March 1, 1913, he receives a distribution, he sells, and he is taxed upon his profits. He says there is a discrimination. A is not freed from any taxes. A has not made any gain. He owns his stock on March 1, 1913. He was entitled to all it was worth, and there could not be any gain accruing. When A sells his stock on March 1, 1913, of which the full value of the accumulated profits was a part, there would not be any gain to him. But how about B? He gets a good bargain, just as the Senator says. He buys stock for $1,000 which actually is worth $1,500. A part of that value is made up of the accumulated earnings made prior to March 1, 1913, which are treated as capital. He sells, after getting a distribution of $500, for $1,500. Has he not made a clear profit of $500 on that transaction? There is nothing theoretical about it. It is exactly the same as if, instead of accumulated profits, it had all been capital, and the capital of the company had been reduced by that amount, and that amount of capital distributed. Will the Senator from Missouri say that in such a case a man should not account for gain, where he has received a distribution of a part of the capital? I would like to have the Senator from Missouri answer that. I can not see any difference.

Mr. REED. As soon as the Senator has concluded, I will answer.

Mr. LENROOT. That is all there is to this proposition. It is a question as to whether a man who has made an actual profit on a transaction, not a theoretical one, by acquiring capital and treating it all as capital, but not income, shall be called upon to account for gain upon a capital transaction.

As I said in the beginning of the discussion, the only possible point of objection that could be made to this is that made by the Senator from New Hampshire, that a man may have heretofore purchased stock relying upon this exemption. Therefore he proposes an amendment, that the second provision of my amendment shall apply only after the passage of this act. Yet, Mr. President, while I see that there is some force to that, after all, no man is taxed under this amendment unless he has made an actual profit out of a capital transaction. Presumably when a man receives a distribution the value of the stock is reduced by the amount of the dividend he receives, speaking of dividends accruing prior to March 1, 1913, and if he sells the stock for just that much less, he is not taxed a penny upon the distribution that has been made; but where men actually make money by such transactions, there is no more reason why that class of stockholders should be taxed upon actual gain any more than that a man who gets a bargain in Pennsylvania Railroad stock, buying it for half what it is worth, must account for whatever gains he makes upon the sale of that stock.

Mr. REED. My purpose a little while ago was to point out the distinction. I may not have done so. This is not a question of taxing the individual upon his gain. It is a question as to whether or not we propose in fact to exempt from taxation the capital accumulated prior to March, 1913—that is, I mean the distribution of the capital, the transaction of distribution. The minute you tax distribution of that capital you take part of the capital itself. When you say that if part of it is distributed that part shall be deducted from the price the man paid, and then tax him upon what he received for his stock less the amount which you distributed to him, you simply tax the distribution. That is all. You tax the distribution of his property which he bought and owns and which was capital assets.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Does the Senator say in the case of a corporation reducing its capital by one-half with a distribution of one-half, that when we come to require an accounting of gain we are taxing a distribution of the capital? The Senator knows we can not tax capital.

Mr. REED. I know that is what the Senator is doing by the second clause of his amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. We are not. We are taxing gain upon capital.

Mr. REED. Oh, no. Suppose it is a partnership with 10 partners and they have 20 horses, and they were owned before March, 1913, and they concluded to distribute those horses after March, 1913. They divide them among themselves and each man takes a horse. There is no tax to be levied there, is there? Suppose that instead of having a partnership they had a corporation composed of 10 men and each man owned a certificate for one-tenth of the assets, and when they declared their dividend they declared it in horses instead of in money and each man got a horse. There would not be any tax there, would there?

Now, suppose that you owned one of those shares and you sold it to me, I would then own two of those horses and they would be mine. No matter what I paid you for the stock I would own two horses. They then come along and give me one of the horses. I only paid $50 for the stock and I sell the horse for $100. I have sold my horse, my share of the distributed capital, which I bought and owned. After a while I sell my certificate in the other horse for $250. You take from that the price I got for my first horse and tax me on the difference. You are simply taxing me on that horse that I got in distribution, and when you put that sort of a condition to that horse you handicap it. Everywhere he goes he has to bear the handicap of the fact that if you buy him you have to subtract the price that you afterwards sell him for from the price that you paid.

You attach to every one of these shares of stock that is to be sold this provision: "If you purchase this share of stock you do it with knowledge of the fact that when the capital distribution dividend is paid it will be subtracted from the price you paid, and when you sell it in the future you will be obliged to account for your profits and be taxed upon your profits, and those profits are ascertained by in fact adding them to the distribution of that capital." There is no escape from that proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. It does not tax any distribution of capital. The sale of the thing ought to be accounted for and the capital that has been distributed should be included in this accounting.

Mr. REED. It does not make any difference how loud the Senator may say it, he does not add any force to the logic.

Mr. LENROOT. But the Senator has been busily engaged with other matters, and while he is usually very clear, yet he can not, I am sure, convince any Senator by the illustration he has been trying to make for the last 10 minutes.

Mr. REED. I may have been so busy in other matters that I can not make this clear to the Senator from Wisconsin, and I regret it very much if I can not; but this is exactly what Dr. Adams has been trying to put over on the committee since the time he brought the question before the committee. It is the exact question. It is the same question he tried to put over before the House committee when he was turned down, because they realized it was in fact the taxation of the capital assets, and after it was defeated here once it is brought up again. I say, as a member of the committee, that I not only think but I know it is the same question.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator may say it is the same question, but it is not the same question at all. The Senator from Missouri ought to know that it is not. Dr. Adams's proposition involved a taxation of the man who owned the stock on March 1, 1913, and subsequently sold it. This proposition has nothing to do with the man who owned the stock on March 1, 1913.

Mr. REED. I never saw a man who was not present at a committee hearing who knew as much about what took place as my friend from Wisconsin. I was present at those hearings and engaged in the discussion. This part of the question was involved absolutely in the discussions with Dr. Adams. He did have a question that was broader than this. This is one phase of it. It was discussed before the committee, reported in here, and it has been defeated once, and we ought not to have to discuss it more than fifteen or twenty times.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator from Missouri again misrepresents. This proposition has never been defeated. It has never been voted upon by the Senate.

Mr. REED. I think it is exactly the same question.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state the point of order.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not making the point of order to cut off any legitimate debate, but I do wish a vote. We desire to clean this matter up between now and to-morrow night. I do not wish to invoke the rule that a Senator shall not speak more than twice upon the same subject in one day, but after it has been made clear and both sides have made their proposition clear, it seems as if we ought to bring the discussion to a close. I am not making the point of order now, but simply offer it as a suggestion to Senators with the request that we close the argument on this as soon as possible.

Mr. REED. I wonder against whom the Senator is making the point of order? I had the floor and yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin to interrogate me, and I have had the floor ever since, and I intend to keep it long enough to say to the Senator from Wisconsin, and I say it moderately and deliberately, that I think the time has about arrived on the floor of the Senate for Senators to begin to use ordinarily polite language. A Senator who states that another Senator is misrepresenting a thing is indulging in pretty grave language. The Senator repeated that several times. The Senator has a right to believe that I am mistaken, but he has no right to charge me with misrepresentation.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I did not mean that the Senator intentionally misrepresented. I referred to the effect of his statement, and, of course, I am ready to repeat that. Of course, I would not charge the Senator with intentionally misrepresenting to the Senate.

Mr. REED. I hope not. I agree with the Senator from North Dakota that the question has been discussed and discussed many times. I think the point is very clear. I do not wish to take any more of the time of the Senate. I was going to yield the floor anyway, and I shall do so now.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if he will not allow the Senator from North Dakota to offer his amendment first and let us vote on it?

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection to that. I am in favor of that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. I understood that. That would simplify matters, it would seem to me, if we could adopt the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota first.

Mr. LENROOT. I do not know of any reason why that can not be done.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand that the vote relates to the same proposition. I can not see why one should be dependent upon the other, but if the Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his amendment for the moment——

Mr. MOSES. It is only collateral and very distantly relating to the other. May I inquire of the Chair whose amendment is now pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is now pending.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask that the amendment to the amendment be stated?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, as follows: On line 11 of the printed amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin strike out the words "since February 28, 1913," and insert in lieu "subsequent to the passage of this act," so that if amended it will read:

2. Where the distributee has acquired his stock or shares subsequent to the passage of this act, the amount so distributed to him shall be applied against and reduce the basis provided in section 202 for ascertaining the gain derived or loss sustained from the sale or other disposition of such stock or shares.

Mr. REED. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	McNary	Shortridge
Broussard	Harrison	Moses	Simmons
Bursum	Heflin	Nelson	Smoot
Cameron	Johnson	New	Spencer
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Stanfield
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Sutherland
Cummins	Kendrick	Norris	Swanson
Curtis	Kenyon	Oddie	Townsend
Edge	Keyes	Overman	Trammell
Fernald	King	Page	Underwood
Fletcher	Ladd	Pittman	Wadsworth

Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	Lodge	Reed	Watson, Ind.
Glass	McCumber	Sheppard	Willis
Hale	McKellar	Shields

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin as amended.

Mr. LENROOT. In view of the amendment which has just been adopted to my amendment, it is necessary to modify the amendment. I modify the amendment, on page 1, in lines 4 and 5, by striking out the words "acquired prior to March 1, 1913," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "acquired prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to say that the statement which I made a short time ago that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin would be satisfactory in the form in which it was then proposed does not apply to it as amended by the amendment of the Senator from New Hampshire. I do not think we should change our policy and make this legislation simply apply in the future.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to add to what the Senator from North Dakota has stated that, in my opinion, the proposed amendment will take from the Treasury of the United States not merely for the future, but by way of refund of what has already been paid in to the United States, I can not tell how much, and I do not think that anyone else can. I want Senators to understand, however, that many claims for refund will have to be paid as the result of the adoption of this amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] as amended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL] and vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and therefore withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. If that Senator were present, I know that he would vote as I am about to vote. Therefore I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT], but on this question I am at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is unavoidably absent. In his absence, I am not at liberty to vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. MYERS. I have a pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. McLEAN], who is necessarily absent. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. RANSDELL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. FERNALD. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES], but I understand on this question he would vote as I am about to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING. I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. Not knowing how that Senator would vote, and being unable to secure a transfer of the pair, I withhold my vote.

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the negative). I note the absence from the Chamber of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], with whom I have a general pair. I transfer that pair to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and vote "nay."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. ERNST] is paired with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY].

The result was announced—yeas 4, nays 62, as follows:

YEAS—4.

Borah	Jones, Wash.	Lenroot	Norbeck

NAYS—62.

Ashurst	Harris	Nelson	Spencer
Broussard	Heflin	New	Stanfield
Bursum	Hitchcock	Newberry	Sutherland
Calder	Johnson	Nicholson	Swanson
Cameron	Kendrick	Norris	Townsend
Capper	Kenyon	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Keyes	Overman	Underwood
Culberson	King	Page	Wadsworth
Curtis	Ladd	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Fernald	La Follette	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Fletcher	Lodge	Pomerene	Warren
France	McCumber	Reed	Watson, Ga.
Frelinghuysen	McKellar	Sheppard	Watson, Ind.
Gerry	McKinley	Shields	Willis
Glass	McNary	Simmons
Hale	Moses	Smoot

NOT VOTING—30.

Ball	Edge	McCormick	Shortridge
Brandegee	Elkins	McLean	Smith

Crow	Gooding	Owen	Sterling
Cummins	Harreld	Penrose	Weller
Dial	Harrison	Poindexter	Williams
Dillingham	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell
du Pont	Kellogg	Robinson

So Mr. LENROOT's amendment as amended was rejected.

Mr. McCUMBER obtained the floor.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me? I should like to offer a part of the amendment just voted on. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 7, line 18, after the period, it is proposed to insert the following:

If any such tax-free distribution has been made, the distributee shall not be allowed as a deduction from gross income any loss sustained from the sale or other disposition of his stock or shares unless, and then only to the extent that, the basis provided in section 202 exceeds the sum of (a) the amount realized from the sale or other disposition of such stock or shares, and (b) the aggregate amount of such distributions received by him thereon.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, this is the first part of the amendment that has just been defeated. I hope this one will not be "perfected" as the other one was by my friend from New Hampshire, resulting in such slaughter of that amendment. I do not think there can be any possible objection to this amendment, which, as I say, is the first part of that amendment, because I do not believe anyone can defend the present law that permits a stockholder to receive a distribution and then sell his stock and account for a loss equal to the amount of the distribution. No one can defend that, and the matter is so plain that I am not going to argue it. I am willing to submit it to a vote of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I now move to amend subdivision (b) of section 201, page 7, line 14, by inserting, after the word "accumulated," the following:

Or increase in value of property accrued.

This will need only slight explanation. The Senator from Alabama has already alluded to it. The old law reads about as follows:

For the purposes of this act every distribution is made out of earnings or profits, and from the most recently accumulated earnings or profits, to the extent of such earnings or profits accumulated since February 28, 1913; but any earnings or profits accumulated prior to March 1, 1913, may be distributed exempt from the tax, after the earnings and profits accumulated since February 28, 1913, have been distributed.

It was understood, I think, by all of us and by the country generally that the mere increase in the increment value of the property prior to March, 1913, was really a part of the undistributed earnings prior to March, 1913; but lately a decision has been rendered by the Treasury Department which was made as late as October 26, 1921. I need only quote from this decision the following:

The express exemption—

That is, applying to the old law, which I have just read—

The express exemption applies to "earnings and profits" accumulated prior to March 1, 1913; and, as has already been demonstrated, these terms do not include unearned increment.

We have always supposed that they did.

A distribution like that under consideration in this case is not, therefore, within the exemption. For the reason above stated, it is concluded that profit made by a corporation in 1918 or subsequent years from the realization of appreciation of corporate assets accrued before March 1, 1913, is taxable income to the stockholders when distributed as a dividend in 1918 or subsequent years.

As that clearly was not the intent of Congress, and to make it clear that, no matter how distributed, if the distributee does not receive any more than his stock was worth on the 1st day of March, 1913, all of that sum will be free from taxation, no matter what he may have paid for that stock any number of years prior to 1913, I propose to amend this provision by inserting the words I have given after the word "accumulated," on page 7, line 14. It will then read:

But any earnings or profits accumulated or increase in value of property accrued prior to March 1, 1913, may be distributed free of taxation.

That is practically all there is in the proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say that this decision or ruling of the department was brought to my attention, and it was my purpose to introduce the amendment which the Senator has just introduced, and I trust that it will be agreed to. It is clearly the meaning that we had in mind at the time we adopted the original provision which we have reenacted in this section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 176, at the end of the amendment already agreed to, following subdivision (k), it is proposed to insert the following:

(l) Subject to regulations, distilled spirits may, upon application of the distiller or owner and order of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, be removed from any internal-revenue bonded warehouse to any other such warehouse at the expense of the applicant. The commissioner may likewise on his own initiative order the proprietor of any warehouse which, in his opinion, is unfit or unsafe for use, to remove the spirits therein to any other warehouse which the commissioner may designate, and in case of neglect or refusal of the proprietor of the warehouse to do so the commissioner may have the spirits removed, and the expense of the compulsory removal shall be paid by the owner of and be a charge against the spirits.

(m) Subject to regulations, spirits may remain in bonded warehouse without payment of tax indefinitely under the conditions prescribed by section 600 (b) of the revenue act of 1918, but the allowances for losses in warehouse, therein or elsewhere prescribed, shall not be dependent upon application for regauge within any specified time, and shall be applicable to spirits withdrawn at any time. The penal sum of any bond required shall be such as is by the commissioner deemed appropriate.

(n) Subject to regulations, distilled spirits may, under the provisions of the act of March 3, 1897, in so far as applicable, be bottled in bond, after or prior to payment of tax, at any internal-revenue bonded warehouse. Spirits bottled prior to payment of tax shall remain in Government bonded warehouse until the tax is paid and shall be removable as provided by subdivision (l).

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, all three of these amendments were prepared in the department. I presume the reason why they happened to be sent to me was because the counsel who prepared them has the good fortune to be a Missouri man. The Secretary of the Treasury writes a letter to me in connection with them, which I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD, stating that in his opinion they are most necessary in the administration of the law. Here is what they do:

The first amendment provides that liquor in a bonded warehouse can be moved into another bonded warehouse. The necessity for it arises from the fact that in many of the Government bonded warehouses there is now but a very small amount of liquor remaining, and yet under the existing law the Government must maintain those warehouses, with all the guards and watchmen and upkeep necessary to maintain the entire warehouse. This provision allows the transfer of liquor in one warehouse to another.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator how many times it allows it to be transferred?

Mr. SPENCER. I should say indefinitely.

Mr. SIMMONS. May I ask the Senator if he will guarantee that there will be no bootleggers along the line to interrupt the transportation?

Mr. SPENCER. There are no such persons in Missouri. I can not speak for other States.

The second amendment simply provides——

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIS. I desire to ask the Senator a question about the first section. I did not understand the reason that he assigned, if he assigned any, as to why it was desirable to remove these spirits. What is the point?

Mr. SPENCER. The point that the Secretary of the Treasury makes, which appeals to me as a good one, is this: At present in many bonded warehouses the amount of liquor has so far diminished that there is very little of it left there, and yet under the existing law those bonded warehouses must be maintained, with all the guards and custodians and upkeep, because, the tax not having been paid and the liquor not having been sold, it can not now be removed.

Mr. WILLIS. In other words, it is thought that this liquor could be moved to other bonded warehouses and some of those now in operation could be closed up, and thus save expense?

Mr. SPENCER. Exactly. The second amendment extends the time within which the payment of taxes can be made upon liquor in the warehouse. Under the present law it is eight years.

Under the existing law the tax on liquors automatically becomes payable at the end of eight years from the time when the liquors are put into the warehouse, and there is no power to extend that time. The tax must be paid, even though the liquor is not sold, and the Treasury Department felt that there was a great hardship being imposed upon those whose liquor had been in store for eight years, but who, under the present condition of the law, could not sell profitably or did not want to sell. Therefore the second provision merely allows the liquors to remain in the warehouse indefinitely, until they are sold, before the tax is collected upon them.

The third and last proposition is that the provision of the present law which limits the bottling of barreled liquor to that liquor upon which the tax has been paid shall be so extended that liquor in bonded warehouses can be bottled even before the tax is paid, and then the bottled goods substituted for the barreled goods and allowed to remain in the warehouse.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, that last paragraph is palpably and clearly in favor of the bootlegger.

Mr. SPENCER. I do not know how the bootleggers look upon it, whether they are in favor of it or not, but it is manifestly fair, because everyone knows there is a certain amount of leakage and a certain amount of evaporation in the case of the barreled liquor, and if there is no opportunity under the law for the owner of a barrel of liquor to bottle it in a bonded warehouse under the care of the Government, but he is compelled to suffer the leakage and evaporation which is incident to keeping liquor in a barrel, it is unfair to the owner of that liquor. The bottles are guarded as carefully as the barrels are, and they are not freed until the tax is paid. This provision gives that privilege.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the Senator's amendment would apparently permit the moving of liquor from one State to another. Am I correct in that?

Mr. SPENCER. It would under the first provision.

Mr. CALDER. I understand that under recent rulings of the prohibition commissioner it is impossible for individuals who own liquor to remove that liquor from one State to another, although it was purchased lawfully. Does the Senator take care of that in his amendment?

Mr. SPENCER. I do not know whether that was in the mind of the Treasury Department, but the amendment does provide for the transfer from one bonded warehouse to another, and the location of the bonded warehouse is not referred to.

Mr. CALDER. Would it permit the movement of liquor from the Senator's house in St. Louis to his home here in Washington?

Mr. SPENCER. I can not inform the Senator from New York whether that could be done under my amendment or not.

Mr. CALDER. I ask that in all fairness, because under the interpretation of the law by the Prohibition Commissioner an individual was allowed to move liquor from his home to another place to which he may have removed, even if it were in another State.

A recent ruling of the prohibition department forbids that, and it seems to me if the Senator proposes to permit an owner of liquor in a warehouse to move it from one warehouse to another, one should have the privilege of moving lawfully purchased liquor from any place of storage to any other place.

Mr. SPENCER. This does not permit what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. CALDER. Would the Senator object to an amendment embodying that idea?

Mr. SPENCER. I would much prefer that the Senator should offer a separate amendment, inasmuch as these are Treasury Department amendments and ought to be acted on one way or another by themselves.

Mr. CALDER. I shall vote against them if that is the Senator's point of view, because if the Treasury Department wants to move liquor from one warehouse to another, I do not see why an individual should not have the same right.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does not the law prohibit the transportation of liquors from one point to another?

Mr. CALDER. The so-called Reed amendment, which Congress adopted several years ago, prohibits that. But the prohibition bureau actually gave permits for the removal of liquor, legally owned, from one part of the country to another, until the 31st of October last, a week ago. No one can legally move liquor now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator from North Dakota say that the proposal contained in the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri is any less a transportation of liquor than the incidents described by my colleague?

Mr. McCUMBER. I suppose the one simply relates to a transportation from one point to another for the purpose of holding the liquor intact. The proposition made by the junior Senator from New York is for the removal of liquor for its consumption. Of course, if it is transported from one house to another, I suppose it would be for that particular purpose. I was not speaking in opposition to it at all, but merely asked whether the law itself, as it now stands, does not prohibit transportation of liquor from one point to another for beverage purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not familiar enough with the details of the law to state, but I have never heard of any such provision as to legally held liquor.

Mr. BROUSSARD. I understand that the courts have held that liquor placed in a private warehouse for private use can not be moved from the warehouse to the home or to another warehouse for storage. The decision did not involve any liquor stored in a public warehouse. I think the amendment would well be in order. In line with the law as construed by the courts, that where a man establishes the fact that he has liquor for his private use stored in a private warehouse, he has the right to transport it upon securing a permit from the Prohibition Bureau.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. If there is no objection, I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, November 3, 1921.

Hon. SELDEN P. SPENCER,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: It has been brought to my attention that you have been requested to introduce certain amendments as subdivisions (l), (m), and (n) of section 602 of the pending revenue bill. You desire to be informed whether the proposed amendments meet with my approval. (Copy of such amendments is inclosed.)

The proposed amendments do meet with my approval, and it seems to me quite important that they should, if possible, be adopted.

The purpose of subdivision (l) is to liberalize the laws relating to the storage of spirits in bonded warehouses and the transfer of spirits from one warehouse to another. Section 3271, R. S., provides that each distiller must establish a bonded warehouse, to be used solely for the storage of spirits by him until the tax is paid. The law further provides for the establishment of general bonded warehouses, to which liquor may be removed from the distillery warehouses prior to payment of tax upon application of the distiller. The production of potable spirits having practically stopped, many of the distillery warehouses now contain very little liquor. However, no matter how small may be the quantity of spirits remaining in a warehouse, it must be guarded by the Government to prevent violation of the national prohibition act and frauds upon the revenue. It is advisable, therefore, to facilitate the transfer of spirits from one warehouse to another under proper supervision, in order to afford every opportunity for the emptying of the warehouses containing only small quantities.

This is sought to be accomplished by subdivision (l) by making liquor removable from one warehouse to another without regard to the class to which it belongs under existing internal revenue laws upon application of the owner as well as the distiller, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue is likewise given authority to have liquor removed from unsafe warehouses without application of either the owner or distiller. To facilitate the removal from one warehouse to another will also tend to give relief to owners of warehouse receipts for liquor in bond who are now being mulcted by the proprietors of the warehouses for excessive storage and other charges. Where the prevailing rate of storage used to be 5 cents to 10 cents per barrel per month charges of $1 per barrel per month are now quite common. Under existing law the tax on spirits is due at the end of eight years from the date of entry into the distillery warehouse. Owing to the restriction upon the sale of spirits produced by prohibition, it is impossible for the tax on all the liquor to be paid within the eight-year period. It is imperative, therefore, to extend the time within which the tax may be paid. Existing law makes the tax on spirits attach as soon as the spirits come into existence, but certain allowances are granted covering losses by leakage and evaporation while the spirits remain in bonded warehouses. Subdivision (m) allows the spirits to remain in bond without payment of tax indefinitely and gives relief from taxation covering losses occurring throughout the time the spirits may remain in bond prior to tax payment.

The existing law allows spirits to be bottled in bond at distillery warehouses after tax payment only. There is no substantial reason why spirits should not be similarly bottled at general bonded warehouses, and to permit such bottling at general bonded warehouses would facilitate the enforcement of prohibition and tend to reduce the possibility of adulteration. To permit bottling at general bonded warehouses as well as distillery warehouses would also facilitate the object sought to be accomplished by subdivision (l). The aging of spirits in wood improves them up to a certain point, but spirits in barrels begin to deteriorate after a certain length of time. While the spirits remain in the barrels loss by leakage and evaporation is continuous. Subdivision (n) would tend to prevent unnecessary loss and deterioration by permitting bottling prior to tax payment.

Sincerely, yours,

A. W. MELLON, Secretary.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I send an amendment to the desk and ask to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 99, after line 22, insert a new subdivision to read as follows:

(c) There shall be included in the return a statement of the amount of dividends paid or declared since the making of the last return, and of the amount of such dividends which have been paid or declared out of the earnings or profits accumulated during the taxable year for which the return is made.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, it seems to me that there ought to be no opposition to this amendment. Its purpose really is only to require the furnishing of information in the returns. There has been much discussion regarding the undistributed incomes of corporations. We have often speculated as to the amount of them and how they should be dealt with. Under the existing law and the regulations of the department no definite information upon that subject is obtainable. We have been proposing legislation bearing upon the question, because we have been dealing wholly in surmises or estimates as to the amount of the undistributed incomes of corporations, and this amendment simply provides that when the corporations shall make their returns, in addition to what the law now requires, namely, a statement of their net income, each corporation shall make a statement regarding the dividends paid out of the incomes for the year for which the return is made, and that will enable the Treasury Department to ascertain the difference. We will then have accurate information upon which we can base our legislation for the future. It is merely for the purpose of getting statistical information for the Congress.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have examined the amendment offered by the Senator, and I certainly can see nothing against it, and I think it will give us some useful information.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I want to bring to the attention of the Senate a comparatively small matter, but one which I think is worthy of some little discussion, although I myself shall be very brief. In order to bring it up, I move to amend the bill by striking out on page 191, from line 11 to line 24, inclusive, and on page 192, from line 1 to line 8, inclusive.

This language has to do with the tax now imposed upon theater ticket brokers. I realize perfectly well the prejudice which exists here and in many other places toward the alleged excessive prices charged to the public for theater tickets, and the disposition of many people to assert that those excessive prices are due to the brokerage business. I shall not discuss the pros and cons of that public conception of the business.

Suffice it to say that in 1918, I think it was, the former Senator from Colorado, Mr. Thomas, introduced an amendment to the revenue bill then pending upon the floor of the Senate, inserting these taxes on the sale of theater tickets to this effect, that if the ticket was sold in excess of the box office price by a broker or other concern except the theater itself there should be paid a tax of 2½ per cent on the first 50 cents excess charge over the box office price, and that if more than 50 cents were charged in excess of the box office price the tax should be 50 per cent of that excess.

The attempt, of course, was to keep down the price of theater tickets by this tax. In a sense it was an attempt to fix prices, to restrict prices, and in many respects I have sympathy with that attempt, and I think the Senate at that time adopted the amendment, which I think was rather hastily prepared, by an overwhelming vote. It has not reduced the prices of theater tickets. It has had exactly the opposite effect; it has increased them, and the revenue derived is next to nothing as compared with the totals of this bill.

Perhaps I am justified in stating just what this system is, against which so many people have made complaint.

Mr. GERRY. What amount of revenue is derived from this tax?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The estimates of the department are, in a sense, misleading; but as I gather them as contained on page 76 of the annual report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue for 1920, and as they are displayed in two columns under two categories, the 2½ per cent tax and the 50 per cent tax on the excess over a 50 per cent addition to box-office prices, the total revenue would seem to be about $190,000. No tax is paid in Alabama, none in Arizona, none in Arkansas, something like $91,000 in California, and there is quite a little paid in New York, although I have no doubt whatsoever that there is a tremendous evasion of this tax; but no disposition to fail to take advantage of it in raising the price of the tickets just the same. Under one category $59,000 is collected in the country, and under the other $135,000 is collected in the country.

Some of the States show remarkable results. For instance, in the first district of Ohio $70 is collected. In the tenth district of Ohio $13 is collected. What the cost of collection is I am going to comment upon a little later.

The thing is somewhat complicated. The people who know most about it, of course, are the theater ticket brokers. Here is the way it works in actual practice. We will say that the box-office price of a theater ticket is $2. The Government puts an admission tax upon that ticket of 20 cents, so that the price to the customer who purchases that ticket is $2.20. But if the customer purchases that ticket through a broker, the broker who generally has his office in one of the great hotels, charges 50 cents for the service he renders to the customer. The brokers generally have have their offices in the great hotels. A tax of 7½ cents is thereupon collected. The customer then pays $2.75 for the ticket.

We will assume that a visitor to New York, for example, coming from some other place and reaching a hotel late in the afternoon, makes up his mind that he wants to go to the theater and he wants to go to a particular theater. He goes to the theater ticket agency in the lobby of the hotel and asks for a ticket, we will say, for the play going on at the Century Theater. He wants that, and that is what he wants. The broker may not have that ticket, but he will endeavor to get it for the customer. So through an elaborate system of telephone communication he calls up other brokers around the city until he finds one who has a ticket for that particular theater on that particular night. When he finds it the other broker sells it to the first broker at a 50 cent advance, charging for the service which he performs.

The price at that point reaches the neighborhood of $3 to the customer. Then the Government steps in and puts a 30-cent tax on that, making the price $3.30. But it is apparent that there is no particular profit in that for the first broker, especially when a profit tax of 50 cents is added, so $1 is added to the price, and the ticket is finally presented to the customer at the rate of about $4.40.

Let us make it a little more simple. The Government receives 20 cents on the original sale. It receives 5 cents on the sale to broker No. 1, plus a tax of 5 per cent on that broker's profit of 50 cents, or 2½ cents, making a tax of 7½ cents on the sale to broker No. 1. Broker No. 2 is requested to furnish a ticket for the entertainment, and informs the customer that he will have to procure such a ticket from another broker, and that the price to the customer will be $3.30. Broker No. 2 pays broker No. 1 $2.75 and broker No. 2 sells it to the customer for $3.30. Thirty cents goes to the Government as the original tax. The original price of the ticket was $2 without any tax. The profit upon the original price was $1, exclusive of the tax, one-half of which is taken by the Government as excess-profits tax. Broker No. 1 received the remaining 50 cents and broker No. 2 has made nothing on the transaction and has lost his overhead charge for maintaining his establishment.

In order for broker No. 2 to accommodate his customer and to make any profit at all, it is necessary to increase the cost of the ticket to the consumer. He therefore raises the price of the ticket to $4, plus 40 cents war tax, or $4.40 to the purchaser. The figures remain the same as in transaction No. 1, which I related when I first started to discuss the situation, except that the Government still takes one-half of the excess, which in this case is $1. Therefore broker No. 2 has paid broker No. 1 $2.75 for the ticket, he has paid the Government $1 for the profit tax on the $2.75 paid. Twenty-five cents is the fixed theater tax paid by the consumer, so this leaves broker No. 1 a profit of 50 cents and broker No. 2 a profit of 50 cents, from which, however, the aforesaid overhead charges should be deducted, leaving a net profit to broker No. 2 on the sale of the ticket at the price of $4.40 of only 5 cents.

The thing has utterly failed of the original intention of the law. Its sole effect has been to raise the price of tickets to the public.

One can get some idea of what a nuisance tax is when one examines the blank return which is required to be filled out by a ticket broker. I have one of them in my hand. It has a long list of instructions of a rather complicated nature, and then follow, printed upon the return, three and one-half pages of blocked blank tables. Each table when filled out is supposed to reflect the tickets sold by the broker, who fills out the return for each theater at which the tickets are good. This blank makes it possible for the broker to fill out for 20 theaters. It is filled out in triplicate. Most of the big brokers serve 60 theaters, so it requires two more of these blanks, making a total of 60 theaters, and therefore he fills out nine of these blanks each month.

What does each block on the blank require? Under each theater heading there must be contained what might be termed the calendar of the month, day by day, and for each day a separate square is reserved. In those squares there must be accounted for every ticket sold or resold by the broker under different headings. He has to state what the established price of admission was excluding the war tax; second, what the broker's selling price was excluding the war tax; third, whether it was an evening or matinee performance. I know of a concern that sells annually 800,000 tickets. Every ticket has to be accounted for on that blank form day by day in any one of 60 theaters.

In order that the collector of internal revenue in the district involved may keep this thing checked up every day, it requires constant visits from the internal-revenue inspectors or agents who four or five times every month examine the records of the sale of every ticket that is made to see if they are trying to evade the tax. Some of the concerns I believe do evade it by not doing it at all. The cost to the Government must be tremendous comparatively in the time spent in trying to trace the history of hundreds of thousands of tickets, with the sole result that the public pays more for the tickets than they did before the tax was imposed.

The revenue, as I said, is next to nothing. I think it was never regarded as a real revenue producer. Our friend, the former Senator from Colorado, Mr. Thomas, as I recollect his remarks upon the floor of the Senate, introduced it in an attempt to keep down the price of theater tickets. I think he cited an instance in his remarks upon that occasion of how he was charged what he deemed an excessive price for theater tickets in New York. It has had exactly the opposite effect. It does no good to anyone. It is a perfect nuisance to everybody concerned, and the revenue is not worth figuring. In many of these places it must be true that the tax is not collected at all.

I am not authorized to speak for him and he has never mentioned the subject to me, but I have heard from fairly reliable sources that the collector of internal revenue in whose district there are any number of theaters has said that the thing is a nuisance, that there is nothing in it, that it is simply a waste of time, and no public good is accomplished.

Therefore my motion to strike it out.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think that there was any prejudice against the broker in inserting this provision into our previous laws and continuing it in the pending bill. It may be a nuisance tax like practically all of that character of taxes, but it deals with that which has become a scandal and a nuisance.

I will admit that there is some prejudice against the system that has grown up. If, for instance, the regular railway charges between Washington and New York were $5 the railroad could hardly make excuse to say, "That is the price, but we have only 500 tickets, and we have already sold to a broker 400 of those tickets, and you will have to buy your ticket from the broker and pay him a larger price."

What is the system that has grown up in the large cities in the matter of the sale of theater tickets?

Take the city of New York. Here is a theater which has a seating capacity of so many. It can sell so many tickets for that day. It finds that there is a big demand for the tickets and that it can not very well increase its price, which is $2 per ticket, and does not wish to do it, so what does it do? It will sell at the box office, say, one half of the tickets. Then it will sell a block of the other half to each of two or three brokers for 50 per cent advance over the regular price of the ticket, and then allow the brokers to hold up the public for still a further advance.

If a man is at a hotel and wants a ticket he telephones down to the box office. They have no more seats, but he may possibly find an opportunity to purchase them at this broker or another broker. He calls up the broker and finds that he can purchase a ticket there, but he will have to pay 50 per cent more for it.

Every theater has a box office at which to sell tickets. What on earth is the necessity for selling any blocks of tickets out to brokers except for the sole and only purpose of securing a price for the tickets over and above the ordinary charges? Why not allow any man to telephone down to the box office and buy a ticket if they have any left, and as long as they have any left, at the regular ticket price?

As this system has been adopted for the very purpose of mulcting the public, it was thought very proper that the Government, if it could not meet it in any other way, should at least share in the profits thus obtained, and that was the purpose of the provision of the law.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am sure that my colleague realizes that there is not a good deal of sympathy for his amendment on the theory that the broker is entitled to very much at our hands. But my colleague pointed out, I thought quite clearly, that this tax is levied finally on the purchaser of the ticket. I think, too, he made it quite clear that the Government gets very little profit out of it. If there were some way to make every ticket broker pay all the tax the Government is entitled to collect from this sort of business, then there would be less reason for us to suggest that the legislation be repealed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It occurs to me that the Congressman who went at this went at it in the wrong way. The committee has attempted, by putting this curiously devised tax, to keep down the price of the tickets. Of course, it has failed utterly, and has had the opposite effect. If the Government could share, as the Senator from North Dakota has said, in the profits of the broker, it might have been a better way to tax their gross business. A small tax imposed against their gross business, or a license tax, we will say, would not have the same effect, at least not so great an effect, in raising the prices of tickets which the public in an emergency demands. The Government could collect the tax with infinitely greater ease, and it would not be an attempt at price fixing, which is always a failure.

Mr. CALDER. I have been approached in this matter by men who are engaged in legitimate business of this kind in New York City, who pay the taxes. They point out that the city of New York pays the greater portion of the taxes; Boston pays a great deal, and Philadelphia a considerable sum, as does also San Francisco, but with the exception of those four cities little or no tax is collected. None to speak of is collected in Chicago; none in Pittsburgh or Cincinnati or Cleveland. Perhaps there is no such system of charging brokerage in those cities. In the four cities of which I speak some tax is collected, but I venture to say not one-tenth of what ought to be collected if the law were strictly enforced.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think the Senator from New York is mistaken in assuming that the purpose of the law was to keep down the price of theater tickets. I do not think any law that we can pass would so operate. When people get the theater craze and all want to go to a certain play, they will go no matter how much they have to pay; but what we did want to get at in this case was the theater that took this method of mulcting the public by selling out great blocks of its space to an advantage over and above its regular charges and what it advertises to be its charges, thereby securing perhaps from 50 per cent to 100 per cent above the regular selling price. Under those circumstances it ought to pay a tax upon that profit.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in reply to what the Senator from North Dakota has stated, let me say to him that I very much doubt the truth of the statement that the theaters sell great blocks of their tickets for the purpose of dividing the profits with the brokers. I have talked to some theater owners on the subject. What happens is this: The broker, realizing the demand upon the theater because of some specially attractive play, himself gets the tickets and makes a profit; but what I complain of in connection with this provision of the law is that it is not enforceable; that we do not get the money out of it. The honest broker pays the tax; and then everybody who buys a ticket has to pay the additional price to the honest as well as the dishonest broker. The amount of revenue collected is small. It seems to me if we take the tax off, the Government would lose very little and the public would be much benefited.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. [Putting the question.] By the sound the noes seem to have it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I call for a division, Mr. President; but before the question is put on the division may I have unanimous consent to modify the form of my amendment? I think I made an error in it. I moved to strike out the language in line 11, at the bottom of page 191, and the language of the first eight lines at the top of page 192. I think I should not have included in my motion to strike out the eight lines at the top of page 192. I modify my amendment in that respect, and move to strike out from line 11 to line 24, inclusive, on page 191.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment of the Senator from New York will be so modified. On this question the Senator from New York asks a division.

Mr. KING. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Is the Senator asking for a division upon the amendment offered by himself?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has asked for a division on his amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have asked for a division on my amendment.

The question being put on a division, the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. KING. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the fact that the bill is about to be reported to the Senate, and unless there is some other amendment to be offered, I think the Senator from Wisconsin has an amendment to propose.

Mr. LENROOT. The amendment of which I spoke is an amendment to a committee amendment which has already been adopted. It will, therefore, be necessary to wait until we get the bill into the Senate to offer the amendment.

Mr. KING. I renew my call for a quorum, Mr. President.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Spencer
Brandegee	Kendrick	Norris	Sterling
Broussard	Kenyon	Overman	Sutherland
Calder	Keyes	Owen	Swanson
Capper	King	Page	Townsend
Caraway	Ladd	Penrose	Trammell
Cummins	La Follette	Phipps	Underwood
Curtis	Lenroot	Poindexter	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lodge	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	McCumber	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Gerry	McKellar	Reed	Warren
Gooding	McKinley	Sheppard	Watson, Ga.
Harris	Moses	Shields	Willis
Heflin	New	Simmons
Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Smoot

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE], the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] are detained from the Senate on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which paragraph 1, on page 196, was adopted. I made a similar request the other night, but there were only a very few Senators present in the Chamber and I did not insist upon it. I desire, however, at least to secure a vote on that proposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote by which the Senate agreed to paragraph 1, on page 196, relating to automobile trucks, automobile wagons, and so forth?

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator to what extent his amendment goes?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to strike out subdivision 1 of Title IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request for the reconsideration of the vote by which the subdivision was agreed to?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senator from Michigan voted against the prevailing side and is therefore not in a position to move a reconsideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND. If the Senator objects, of course I can take it up in the Senate; but I thought that we could dispose of it in a very few minutes. That was the only reason I had for making the request; but if the Senator objects, of course the matter will go over until the bill reaches the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I feel very certain that I voted in favor of that clause, and I do not want to see a Senator denied the opportunity to present an important proposition. I will make the motion to reconsider paragraph (1) of Title IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, my understanding is that a motion to reconsider is subject to debate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is subject to debate.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we voted upon that proposition at one time. It was voted down because it meant that it would take off from this bill $30,000,000, and we are seeking every possible way to hang on to a little revenue, so as to make the bill square in its amount with the amount of the demands upon the Treasury during the next fiscal year. If now we knock out this $30,000,000, it means that we shall have to find some other place to raise the $30,000,000. We have thrashed out nearly every other possible feature of the bill and every other means of raising revenue, and one after another has been voted down, and one provision after another has been cut out, until we are now running close to the line, with perhaps not more than a million or so to spare. For that reason it seems to me that we ought not to cut into this proposition for the purpose of relieving from taxation the autotrucks or, I might say, anything else contained in the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if there is one feature of the tax bill that is not complained of, it is this. The tax furnishes a very substantial revenue; and if the Senate is going to begin to throw overboard taxes to this amount and of this character, we might as well stop entirely attempting to raise sufficient money for the requirements of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, in answer to the Senator from North Dakota I wish to say that the other night, when I called up this matter, he and all other Senators understood the situation; there were only four or five votes cast, and it was late, and I did not call for a quorum or for a yea-and-nay vote. I simply wanted to get an expression of the Senate upon this particular proposition.

I believe that automobile trucks and automobile wagons are two of the things that ought not to pay a tax, any more than any other vehicle of transportation should pay a tax. I think the prosperity of the country to a great extent depends upon these vehicles. They are already paying a heavy tax. The automobiles and automobile trucks pay, perhaps, a heavier tax than is paid by the various implements that are used by the people. They are practically supporting the roads; they are maintaining the roads, and in some of the States they are building the roads by the taxes that are put upon them.

I realize that we need revenue. I am satisfied from the discussion I heard yesterday and this morning between the Senator from Utah and other Senators that this bill is going to raise more revenue than is estimated. I am very anxious at least to get a vote of the Senate upon this proposition.

I do not care to argue the question any longer; but I thought it was but proper that we should have a vote on it. All I have asked is that we shall have a vote on this proposition, and I thought that when I requested a reconsideration it would be granted, as it is usually granted to every Senator who asks for that privilege.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question? Why should he simply relieve the trucks, used generally in the cities for heavy hauling, and so forth, and so far as I know used by those who make a decent profit in the business, and yet leave a tax upon the little Fords and other cheap automobiles that the farmer has to buy now to keep up with the times for rapid transit between his farm and his home? There are perhaps 100 automobiles held upon the farm in the country—where they are just as necessary as the trucks—where there is a single automobile truck held on the farm.

I can see no difference between the two. If anything, I should have felt that the exemption, if it applied at all, ought to apply to the automobile that is used for business as well as for pleasure; but the amount involved in relieving them all would mean from $130,000,000 to $140,000,000, and if you make the division anywhere, I do not think it has been made in the right place by applying it simply to trucks.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, if we could get along without the revenue I would remove the tax on all of these vehicles, but I can see a difference between trucks and truck wagons and the ordinary automobile. Every truck or truck wagon is used for a useful purpose, and not for pleasure. It is used in the business of the country and contributes very largely to the carrying on of the business of the country. It was for that reason that I made the motion, and made the distinction as between those vehicles and other motor vehicles.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. TOWNSEND. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume that the definition of trucks would undoubtedly cover most of the delivery wagons if they are truck wagons. Therefore the Boston Store down here would have to pay no tax upon the wagons that it purchases, but the farmer who drives a Ford out in the country to bring his small amount of milk in and get it delivered before 4 o'clock in the morning would have to pay a tax upon his vehicle.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My information is that there are hundreds of thousands, probably at least 200,000, of these trucks owned by farmers, and they are going to be more and more extensively owned and used by them for farm work. I repeat, there is no more reason why the farmer should be taxed upon an autotruck than there is why he should be taxed upon a wagon drawn in any other way. At any rate, I should like to have the matter submitted to the Senate for a vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators in favor of the motion will say "aye." [A pause.] Those opposed will say "no." [A pause.]

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I wanted to make an inquiry before the question was put. Has not this matter been reconsidered once?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. LODGE. If it has been reconsidered once it can not be reconsidered again.

Mr. TOWNSEND. But there have already been several instances of reconsideration a second time in the bill before us.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, what was the result of that vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion was put, and the motion prevailed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think Senators understood that there was to be a vote. The Senator from Massachusetts had risen and was addressing the Chair, and I supposed therefore that there would not be a final vote; that the "No" vote would not be put until after he had been recognized. I did not vote at all, and yet I desired to vote "No." I ask the Chair to put the question again.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote which was just carried.

Mr. PENROSE. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then it stands. That is all right.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I ask for a division upon the question, because there was no actual vote cast.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators in favor of reconsideration will stand.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I thought unanimous consent had been asked for a reconsideration and that had been refused.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I gave notice the other day when this very provision was defeated that I should ask for a separate vote on it when the bill came into the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. That is all right, of course.

Mr. HEFLIN. I gave that notice the other day.

Mr. LODGE. This is a request for a second reconsideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a point of order: What is the real question before the Senate now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request of the Senator from North Dakota for a division.

Mr. McCUMBER. A division on what subject?

The VICE PRESIDENT. On whether there is to be a reconsideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. A reconsideration of what? That is what I am trying to get at.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A reconsideration of the vote on paragraph (1), Title IX, page 196, automobile trucks and automobile wagons.

On a division, the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Now, Mr. President, I move to strike out subdivision (1) of section 900 on page 196, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. The question is simply whether we shall agree or disagree to the committee amendment. It can not be stricken out.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have no objection to that. It will amount to the same thing. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Just how would it read if the motion of the Senator from Michigan should prevail? What part of the section is he moving to strike out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 196, lines 16 to 19, read as follows:

(1) Automobile trucks and automobile wagons (including tires, inner tubes, parts, and accessories therefor, sold on, or in connection therewith, or with the sale thereof), 3 per cent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. The Senator from North Dakota states that this is a committee amendment. I should like to ask if it is a committee amendment or whether this is a provision of the House bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a committee amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator that it is a committee amendment only in the sense that the committee reenacts the provision of the old law.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Was it carried in the House bill?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think it was. I am not sure about that, however.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will state to the Senator that it is the same as the present law, 3 per cent.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Then, if we strike it out, we will not have agreed with the House.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; if we strike it out, of course we will have stricken out the old law as it now stands, and we will have no tax.

Mr. TOWNSEND. That is what I want, and I want to be sure what our action will mean. If the rejection of that amendment means the elimination of the tax on automobiles, that is the thing I am trying to accomplish by my motion. If that will be the result, then a vote in the negative means striking it out and removing the tax.

Mr. MOSES. That is not the form in which the amendment is stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. MOSES. I make the point of order that no business has been transacted since the last quorum call.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been business transacted. The Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harris	New	Simmons
Brandegee	Heflin	Newberry	Smoot
Broussard	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Spencer
Calder	Kendrick	Norris	Sterling
Capper	Kenyon	Overman	Sutherland
Caraway	Keyes	Owen	Swanson
Cummins	King	Penrose	Townsend
Curtis	Ladd	Phipps	Trammell
Fernald	La Follette	Pittman	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Lenroot	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
France	Lodge	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
Frelinghuysen	McCumber	Ransdell	Watson, Ga.
Gerry	McKellar	Reed	Willis
Gooding	Moses	Sheppard
Hale	Nelson	Shields

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, from the attitude of Senators, it would appear that any opposition to the motion of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] will prove unavailing. The Senator represents the popular view—apparently the popular view in the Senate, and unquestionably the popular view throughout the country. Those who have the responsibility of providing tax bills have a heavy burden placed upon them, and in periods of depression, such as exist at the present time, the burden becomes more oppressive. The Republicans are in power, and the responsibility of providing a tax measure rests upon them. If an unwise and improvident revenue bill is enacted, they must bear the blame. If an insufficient amount of revenue is provided under the tax bill framed by them, as a result of which bonds have to be issued in peace times in order to raise sufficient revenue to meet the expenses of the Government, the party in power must bear the obloquy resulting from such an unwise and impolitic course.

As a member of the minority in this Chamber, if I desired to play politics, I should vote for every motion to reduce taxes upon individuals and all commodities entering into the life and activities of the people. I am unwilling, however, to take that course. I have been anxious to secure a wise and just revenue bill and have supported the majority when I believed they were right and the interests of the public and the Government required. I should be glad if it were possible to remove all taxes from auto trucks and automobiles and from various commodities and articles which are taxed by this bill. It is no pleasure for me to vote for taxes, but the necessities of the Government are such that a very large revenue must be raised. In the consideration of this bill I have proceeded upon the theory that it was my duty as well as the duty of the minority to aid the majority in every fair and legitimate way to secure a revenue law that will provide the Government with needed revenue. I have attacked provisions that I thought were improper and have opposed efforts to free corporations from what I conceived to be fair and just burdens. I appreciate the difficulties encountered by the committee in preparing a revenue bill under existing conditions, and sympathize with them in their efforts to find sources from which to obtain needed revenue. The bill before us is defective in many particulars, and as reported it failed, in my opinion, to reach sources from which revenues should be obtained. I have supported propositions to increase the surtaxes, and I have felt that it was a mistake to entirely relieve the enormous profits of business from taxation.

I was not willing to support a general sales tax or a turnover tax, because such taxes would, in my opinion, bear oppressively upon the great masses of the people. I have stated that certain commodities should be taxed, or, rather, that a form of sales tax should be applied to various commodities.

All Senators would be glad to extend exemptions in every possible way to agriculturists and to all classes of people, but it is impossible to extend exemptions and deductions to everybody and to everything.

It is apparent that $4,000,000,000 can not be raised under the bill in its present form and that that amount or more will be needed to meet the expenses of the Government. If further reductions are made and additional provisions of the bill are successfully attacked the deficit that will result will be increasingly great. It would be a most unwise and, indeed, an unpatriotic thing for the minority or any group in the Senate to so mutilate and amend this bill so that it would utterly fail to yield revenues imperatively needed to run the Government.

In Europe we see the spectacle of legislative bodies refusing to impose sufficient taxes to meet current expenses. There can be but one result from such an unwise, not to say cowardly, course. It would be most unfortunate if we were to refuse to raise sufficient revenue to meet the operating expenses of the Government and be compelled to resort to further bond issues. In war times it is justifiable to issue bonds. Indeed, in the recent war we were compelled to borrow billions of dollars in order to prosecute the war, but now that peace has come the duty rests upon Congress, and it is one which can not be shirked, to enact tax measures that will be not only sufficient to meet current expenses but to provide an adequate sinking fund to care for maturing obligations of the Government. It would be discreditable in the highest degree if Congress should refuse to deal with the subject of taxation in a courageous manner and enact a tax measure that will produce adequate revenue.

Mr. President, these observations may not be regarded as entirely pertinent to the question, but I have submitted them in order that my position might be understood and with the desire to bring, if possible, support to every legitimate and proper effort to frame a just and suitable tax bill. This bill possesses enough defects now to justify an indictment against it. It is imperfect and contains many sins both of omission and commission, but, imperfect as it is, it is our duty, I submit, to not further mar it or to rob it of proper provisions which are necessary for the production of revenue. I sincerely hope the bill may be so perfected that upon its final passage I may give it my support.

The provision under consideration will yield $30,000,000. As stated, I should be glad to see the automobile industry or the users of trucks relieved from the payment of this tax; but if this sum is taken from the bill, it must be raised from some other source. The proponents of this motion do not offer any other avenue for exploration in order to obtain a similar amount of revenue. As stated, taxes must be obtained from some source, and this item is an important part of the bill. As I am advised, the greater part of this $30,000,000 will be paid by the automobile trucks and accessories used in the cities and for transportation purposes.

The agriculturalists will pay but a small part of this sum. Hundreds of millions of dollars are being expended upon the highways of the Nation. The cities are heavily taxed to maintain their system of streets and highways. The same is true of counties and States; and but yesterday we adopted the report of the committee, of which the Senator from Michigan is chairman, by the terms of which $90,000,000 were appropriated by the Federal Government in aid of good roads.

Undoubtedly the millions spent for highways are of immense advantage to the manufacturers of automobile trucks and to the purchasers of the same. Undoubtedly the use of trucks upon the highways of our country calls for larger appropriations to keep them in repair. More and more trucks are being employed by the people, not only for their personal use but in transportation of an interstate character. The highways between Washington and New York and between other great cities of the land are literally filled with trucks conveying all kinds of commodities and products. Those who employ them for transportation purposes obtain suitable revenues for the services rendered. They are not required to purchase rights of way or to construct tracks, as railroad transportation companies are compelled to do. I make this statement not by way of criticism but merely for the purpose of putting before the Senators matters with which they are familiar but which should be considered in passing upon the motion before us.

It is true that the States and many municipalities impose licenses and taxes upon automobiles or upon their use, and undoubtedly large revenues are obtained therefrom. I submit, however, that the Federal Government, in view of the present situation and the imperative need for large revenues, is justified in imposing this moderate tax upon automobile trucks and accessories. In my opinion, the agriculturists and those who are using the trucks, as well as the manufacturers, will not object to this tax. They appreciate the needs of the Government and will patriotically meet every legitimate demand that may be made.

I sincerely hope that the natural desire to relieve the people from taxation—and it is an entirely proper one—will not deter Senators from the duty of imposing taxes which must be raised in order to meet the expenses for the coming year. I wish we could reduce our appropriations to $2,000,000,000 for the fiscal year 1923, but that is impossible. In all probability the appropriations will exceed $4,000,000,000. We can not justify our constant support of all appropriation bills and then oppose every form of taxation. If we spend money we must raise money and it is not courageous, nor is it statesmanlike, to support schemes to take money from the Treasury and then refuse support to measures which will replenish the Treasury.

I shall support the committee, Republican as it is, whenever and wherever I believe it is seeking the path of justice and right. While I am in sympathy with the proposition of the Senator from Michigan, I feel constrained to support the committee on this matter. I repeat, that with the changes being made in the bill before us, there will be a deficit to be met.

Mr. CURTIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. KING. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I understand that under the bill as it is now prepared there will be a shortage of $20,000,000 in the revenues, and that if this amendment is agreed to the shortage will be $50,000,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have studied this bill with some care, as well as the recommendations and demands made by the various departments, and I make the prediction to my friend from Kansas that the revenue collected under this bill will fall short by more than $250,000,000.

With this situation before us we can not follow our desires or inclinations. We are compelled to act for the general good and in the interest of the Government. Of course, it would be popular to eliminate many of the taxes provided in this bill, but it is clear that if we intend to afford to the Government sufficient revenue to meet current expenses we must impose taxes not only upon corporations but upon individuals.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Just a word, Mr. President. I stated a while ago that while it is true that we are building expensive roads and appropriating money for them, we are maintaining those roads practically throughout the United States by the revenue derived from the taxes on automobiles and automobile trucks. One of the commissioners of public roads of Missouri stated before the committee that they were expecting to raise all of the money for matching the Federal-aid money by a tax upon motor cars which passed over the roads.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, it is immaterial; but there must be some mistake. The State just voted a bond issue of $60,000,000 to build roads.

Mr. TOWNSEND. There was testimony taken before the Committee on Roads in the House, and one of Missouri's commissioners did testify that that is the way they were to raise the money to match the Federal-aid money we are to put up.

I do not want to repeat all I have said on this question. All I ask for is a vote. I have heard the argument made every time this question has been up that we will lose so many million dollars. I do not know whether the Senators who make those statements know what they are talking about or not. I know it is a good argument to advance, that we are going to lose so much revenue. I do know, from statements made on the floor of the Senate, that some Senators expect more money to be raised under this bill than has been estimated.

This matter can go to conference, and it ought to go to conference. If there is a tax on automobiles now, it could not be raised above this amount anyway, and I think it might be less; and, as far as I am concerned, as I view the prosperity of the country and the needs of the country, I think we are justified in asking that these vehicles be exempted from this 3 per cent tax. Anyway, I would like to have a vote on it.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I rise for the purpose of indorsing what the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] has so well said. I insisted when we had this provision up a few days ago that this tax should be taken off of these autotrucks. I think the Senate should vote to-day to exempt these trucks from the tax provisions of this bill. Surely if the great holding companies of the country can have their millions exempt and the profiteers can have $450,000,000 handed over to them the Senate can well afford to take the taxes off the autotrucks. The automobiles that are used over the country generally should be exempt from the tax provisions of this bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FLETCHER (when his name was called). Transferring my general pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], I vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I do not see that Senator present. I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD] and vote "yea."

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is absent. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] to the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. CAMERON] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Nevada [Mr. ODDIE] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. MYERS. I have a general pair with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], who is necessarily absent. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. My understanding is that if present that Senator would vote as I am about to vote on this amendment. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the affirmative). I observe that the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], with whom I have a general pair, has not voted and appears to be absent. I transfer the pair which I have with that Senator to my colleague [Mr. CROW], who is absent from the city, and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

So the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 196, after line 19, insert the following:

Provided, That this subdivision shall not be in effect after December 31, 1922.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. KING. The point of order is that this matter has been before the Senate twice in different forms, and that this is but a different way of submitting the same question which has been decided by preceding votes.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I make the further point of order that it is an amendment to the committee amendment which has just been agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order of the Senator from North Dakota is well taken.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I reserve the right to offer the amendment when the bill is in the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I present an amendment, which I ask may be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 16, line 15, strike out the semicolon and the remainder of the line and all of lines 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20, and insert in lieu thereof a period and the following:

If such net loss is in excess of the net income for such two succeeding taxable years, the amount of such excess shall be deducted from the net income of the taxpayer for the taxable year preceding the taxable year in which the net loss occurred, and the taxes imposed by titles 2 and 3 of the revenue act of 1918 or this act for such preceding taxable year shall be redetermined accordingly. Any amount found to be due to the taxpayer upon the basis of such redetermination shall be credited or refunded to the taxpayer in accordance with the provisions of section 252. The deduction in all cases shall be made under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the amendment simply brings into force a provision of the law which applies only to the year 1919. In the present revenue law provision was made whereby if a taxpayer had a loss in any one year he could deduct that loss from his net income of the succeeding year, and if the profits or net income of the succeeding year were not sufficient to equalize that loss, that then he could go into the preceding year and have the taxes which he had paid adjusted so as to compensate for the loss. That is in the revenue law now, but owing to the peculiar circumstances under which that provision was put into the law it was limited only to losses which might occur in the year 1919. That came about in this way. When that law was first framed it was the idea that we would have another revenue law for the next year, but changes were made in it, and it became a continuing law, and that provision was limited to the one year.

The committee has reported an amendment to the present law which makes the provision that if in any year the taxpayer suffers a loss he shall have a right to deduct that loss from his net income in the succeeding year; and if that is not sufficient that he may deduct it for the next succeeding year; or, in other words, he may continue the deduction of the loss for any one year through the two succeeding years. My amendment proposes to strike out the second succeeding year and to insert in lieu thereof an adjustment of taxes for the preceding year.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. I want to say to the Senator, Mr. President, that I admit a very great amount of equity and justice and mercy to the taxpayer in his amendment; but I am curious to know why the Senator has waited until the last days of the consideration of the bill to bring it up? I do not recall that the Finance Committee was given an opportunity to pass upon the proposal; and I am informed on the floor here that the loss of revenue by the adoption of the amendment would be some $70,000,000. I want to tell the Senator that this amendment appeals to me very strongly, and my only regret is its lateness in being presented and submitted.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am myself sorry that the committee did not consider this matter. Of course I understand that the Senator from Pennsylvania is undertaking to put that responsibility upon me.

Mr. PENROSE. The committee could not go roving around the domain of human knowledge to find relief for taxpayers. It is the duty of the members of the committee, of other Senators, and of the taxpayers themselves to bring matters before the committee. The particular relief now proposed, apparently just and small but large in its results, was never presented to the committee or to the department, as I am informed.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Once before the Senator from Pennsylvania has made the same criticism of amendments which I have offered here, and on a former occasion I explained my action to the Senate. I am glad that everyone who may be interested in the subject may know the reason for the course I have pursued; but I have no apology to make now for presenting the amendment to the Senate.

Mr. PENROSE. I did not want any apology from the Senator or expect it. I was prompted in rising in my seat by a kindly spirit, to convey to the Senator my sympathy with his good intentions and my regret that the amendment had not been pressed earlier. I never thought of inquiring why or wherefore in that connection.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am, of course, very glad to know that the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania realizes the merit of the amendment, and, regardless of the manner in which the amendment comes before the Senate, I certainly feel that the Senate should consider it upon its merits.

As I have heretofore stated, the amendment is designed practically to put into operation the same provision which the Senate deliberately put into the existing law, but unfortunately that provision was confined to one year; its operation ceased at the end of the year. The purpose of the amendment is to continue what was then considered, without objection from any source, to be a meritorious measure.

The Finance Committee did consider the question of the readjustment of incomes for purposes of taxation.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator permit a statement?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. PENROSE. In that respect, I think I ought to correct the Senator. It is true that such a provision was suggested, but it was to cover the anticipated rapidly falling values of inventories on account of the cessation of the World War. No such provision, however, was then contemplated or suggested as a permanent feature of a revenue bill. It was merely intended to meet a special emergency due to a world-wide war, and it ceased when that war had permitted readjustment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The Senator from Pennsylvania, I am sure, did not quite grasp what I intended to convey. The committee considered the question in the reforming of the pending bill, but instead of adopting the provision which went into the existing law it proposed something new. The existing law provides for an adjustment with respect to the succeeding year as well as the preceding year. Now, the committee proposes to change that method and make it apply to the two succeeding years only.

It may be that a man who is engaged in business will have a net loss; he may have such a loss that he is forced out of business or is so crippled in his business that he will have no net income for the succeeding year; but if he has paid an income tax for the preceding year, why should he not have a readjustment? It is nothing but fair that income taxes shall be based, in a measure, upon the average gains of business. If one concern happens to have a large income one year and then suffers an absolute loss the next year there ought to be some adjustment of that condition. Then, in the subsequent year, if a man makes an income he perhaps is using that income in paying off the mortgage which he had to put upon his farm or his ranch by reason of the loss in the year in which he incurred a loss. If he is not making sufficient income the next succeeding year to compensate for that loss, it seems to me he ought not to wait until a second succeeding year to know whether or not he can recoup his losses. If he has paid an income tax the preceding year, it seems to me that that ought to be considered and the whole matter adjusted over that period.

The greatest criticism against the income tax law arises from that very situation so far as business is concerned. Business is vacillating as to its prosperity. Take the cattle business, for instance, or the sheep business, or the manufacturing business, or a mercantile business, or any other class of business. It will be found that gains and losses go up and down; there may be a big income one year and a heavy loss the next year and some little income recovery in a succeeding year, and, perhaps, some further slight recovery the following year; but why should the business man wait until the second succeeding year to have an adjustment of his income taxes? So it seems to me that the committee in framing the existing law which limits the readjustment to one year acted wisely in providing that the losses should be deducted from the income of the succeeding year, and that if that is not sufficient the taxpayer should have a readjustment of his income taxes for the preceding year.

The Senator from Pennsylvania recognizes the merits of the amendment and I submit that everyone ought to recognize its merit. The poor unfortunate who suffers a loss in any one year, and is not successful in recouping that loss in the succeeding year, ought to have a readjustment of his income tax before the succeeding year, and have his income tax refunded upon the basis of the income for the three years in order at least to give him an opportunity to recoup in his business, to go on in his business and to have some assistance, with the hope that he may make an income for the succeeding years and after a while pay an additional income tax.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I pay an income tax this year upon a good income, and next year I have a loss so that I have no income, does the Senator think that I should have a right to go back to the income tax paid this year and ask the Treasury to reimburse me for what I have paid in to the extent of what I have earned in the two years so as to deduct my losses in the succeeding year for the past year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The amendment which I propose is not just that, although it embodies the idea of the Senator's suggestion to some extent. It provides that the taxpayer shall deduct that loss from the net income of a succeeding year; but if that is not sufficient, then he may go back to the preceding year, and have a readjustment of his taxes for that period.

Mr. McCUMBER. And, of course, he would thereby call upon the Treasury for the difference between what he has paid in any one year and what he would have paid had the subsequent year's losses been credited.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is precisely the situation. I am sure the Senator understands it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to say to the Senator, if he will allow me, that many people were clamoring during the month of December last who saw that they were having heavy losses during the last half of the year 1920 for a provision of that kind by which the losses of that year might be recouped as against what they had paid in taxes the previous year. The committee made an investigation and realized what would be lost by it, and so it was entirely out of the question to take the desired action.

We can enact legislation which will anticipate to some extent the future, and allow people to take advantage in the future of something that is going to happen in the future, but when we say that the taxpayer can not only do that but in addition can take his chances in a line of business and, if he loses, can recoup his losses against previous payments made to the Government, it seems to me that we are treading upon very dangerous ground; and it means, as has been suggested by the chairman of the committee, from $70,000,000 to $100,000,000 loss to the Government.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the committee in its proposal limits this whole matter of adjustment for any taxable year beginning after December 31, 1920; so that it will only apply to losses occurring subsequent to that date. It would not permit anybody suffering losses in 1920 to recoup those losses by the adjustment of taxes paid in 1919. The committee limits that; and even if we adopt the provision which the committee proposes there are those two years for which there will be no adjustment—the year 1919 and the year 1920.

I should like to get at the real reason why the committee is disposed to oppose this amendment. They are willing that the taxpayer's losses shall be recouped, and that he shall deduct them from the net income of the two succeeding years. That recognizes the fact that he is entitled to have a readjustment of those taxes; but when the Senate committee considered the law of 1918 it contained a provision which would operate precisely as the amendment which I now propose.

Here is another reason for that: Taxes upon individual business operate in a very peculiar way. It is proposed by the bill as it now stands that there shall be a flat tax upon corporations. Upon the individual in business there is only the normal tax and then the surtaxes. That means that if the individual business or partnership makes a large income in any one year, it must pay surtaxes upon that. If it makes no income the next year or a small income, it still has no average income. There remain the high surtaxes on the income of the prosperous year, at a rate much higher than that levied upon corporations. By reason of that discrimination the individual in his prosperous years must pay a penalty. He must pay the high taxes. They may run to 25 or 50 per cent. He pays them. The next year he makes no profit, or but little profit, and he pays no tax, but when he does have an income he is paying a tax higher than the corporation would pay. In that respect, therefore, there should be an equalization; but why should not these income taxes be distributed or estimated with respect to a period of years? It is the average income, it is the average prosperity of business, which ought to pay the tax; but if you make a man pay a high tax in one year, and he makes losses in the next year, he is still out of that money. He may never recoup that loss, and he has paid the Government this revenue, and if you are going to adjust it with respect to the two succeeding years, there is no reason why it should not be adjusted with respect to the year of the loss and the year succeeding and the year preceding the loss.

It is an equitable adjustment. If it were not equitable it would not have been presented to the Senate in the existing law for the year 1918. At that time everybody recognized that it was a just provision, and now unquestionably there are some cases which have induced the Treasury Department to insist upon this modification. It must be that there is somebody who is going to suffer a loss in 1921 who paid a high tax in 1920. That is what it means, and they do not want him to recoup that loss or have an adjustment of his taxes with respect to his income of 1920, 1921, and 1922. Under my provision he will have first to see whether he has any income for the taxable year 1922. If he has, then he deducts his loss from that under the bill as presented by the committee and as proposed by them; and if that is not sufficient, then he has an adjustment of the income tax which he paid for the preceding year.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, there is quite a little difference between allowing a deduction next year for losses that are incurred this year and those of subsequent years, because in either of those two instances the Government then will get only so much money into the Treasury as it is entitled to; but after the money has been paid into the Treasury for one year, and probably has been expended during that year, and then, because of general depression throughout the country, a great many taxpayers have suffered loss, it seems to me to say that they can come back and recoup a part of that loss against the Government which has received the money, would be putting the Government in a dangerous position.

It might not be so dangerous in a time when prices were soaring and everyone was prosperous, but when you come to a condition in which we do not know what 1922 may be and we have collected our money for 1921, and every dollar is necessary to meet the obligations of the Government, and then in 1922 we may have such a further depression that we scarcely get more than half of the former income tax into the Treasury of the United States, the Treasury would lose not only what it had intended to secure, but in addition to that it would have to provide means to meet the demands upon it because of the losses of the succeeding year. That seems to me to be a very dangerous position to be left in; and it is doubly so when the first effect of it is to take from $75,000,000 to $100,000,000 out of the Treasury or out of the contemplated revenues, every dollar of which we must have.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is with the utmost reluctance that I have to disagree with my friend and colleague upon the committee, the Senator from New Mexico.

It is true, as stated by the Senator from New Mexico, that in framing the act of 1918 we adopted a provision similar to that proposed by the Senator now; but the Senator will recall, as I do with some vividness, the conditions under which we did that and the reluctance with which we did it at the time. The act of 1918 was passed immediately after the signing of the armistice. There was great apprehension throughout the business world that there was going to be a sudden and great and ruinous slump in the prices of commodities. Merchants were especially apprehensive that as a result of this slump they were going to face bankruptcy, because they had purchased their stocks upon which their inventories were based at the high-peak prices of the war.

After hearing a great many witnesses who insisted that it was imperative that relief be given to them against the high income tax that would have to be paid based upon the high-cost price of the goods that they had on hand the committee decided that in order to relieve that situation, to avert a possible danger that would be of nation-wide application, they would permit the taxpayer who might sustain great losses as the result of a fall in his inventories to have a rebate on his income tax for the previous year, and, if necessary, we provided for a refund out of the Public Treasury for the excess of the tax over the losses. However, we confined the provision to that year for the reason that it was anticipated that that result could occur only once, and that if it occurred at all it would be in the year immediately preceding the close of hostilities.

The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico, if it is adopted, will put its hands into the Treasury, take out money that was paid to the Government last year on incomes, and refund it to the taxpayer in order to make up his losses of this year. I think that would be a very dangerous thing to do in these times. Senators on the other side say that probably there would be a loss of revenue to the amount of $70,000,000. I do not know whether the experts have given them those figures or not, but I am under the impression that the loss would probably exceed that amount.

I think all that a taxpayer who loses money this year has a right to ask of the Government is that if next year he shall make a profit these losses shall be deducted from that profit. This bill provides that if next year's income is less than the losses he may have his losses made up out of the income of the next succeeding year; so that we give him that great protection against losses of this year. However great those losses are, he is entitled to offset them against his entire earnings for the next two years; but the Senator proposes that in addition to that, if that is not enough, we shall allow him to go back and take out of the Treasury the money that he paid into it last year on his gains of that year.

I think that is doing a little too much for the taxpayer, Mr. President. While we did it once, we did it under the most remarkable circumstances. We did it reluctantly, and we did it because it appeared to us that the apprehensions of the business world at that time were justified by the conditions.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I want to say just one further word.

There are going to be during this year considerable losses in a number of industries—in the live-stock business, especially—and there is no probability that those losses will be recovered during the next two succeeding years. Some of them may have paid a high income tax last year, other businesses just the same, but I submit that there should be a readjustment of the taxes; and if you are going to readjust, if you have any expectation that during the next two years there will come a time when the income will meet the losses of the current year, why let the taxpayer wait? If you adjust it out of his taxes paid last year, if he does make the income in the second succeeding year, he will then pay a tax on it, but you readjust the matter at the time when he needs it the most; and I do not believe that the Government ought to work this hardship upon the business interests of the country. Let us adjust these taxes as they should be adjusted, in a way which is equal for people who have their ups and downs in business and those who have their permanent, fixed-income investments.

So the amendment of Mr. JONES of New Mexico was rejected.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. TOWNSEND in the chair). The Secretary will read the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 78, after line 20, insert a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. 229. That in the case of the organization as a corporation within four months from the passage of this act of any trade or business in which capital is a material income-producing factor, and which was previously owned by a partnership or individual, the net income of such trade or business from January 1, 1921, to the date of such organization may at the option of the individual or partnership be taxed as the net income of a corporation is taxed under Titles II and III; in which event the net income and invested capital of such trade or business shall be computed as if such corporation had been in existence on and after January 1, 1921, and the undistributed profits or earnings of such trade or business shall not be subject to the surtaxes imposed in section 211, but amounts distributed on and after January 1, 1921, from the earnings or profits of such trade or business accumulated after December 31, 1920, shall be taxed to the recipients as dividends; and all the provisions of Titles II and III relating to corporations shall, so far as practicable, apply to such trade or business: Provided, That this paragraph shall not apply to any trade or business the net income of which for the taxable year 1921 was less than 20 per cent of its invested capital for such year: Provided further, That any taxpayer who takes advantage of this paragraph shall pay the tax imposed by section 1000 of the revenue act of 1918 as if such taxpayer had been a corporation on and after January 1, 1921.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, this simply provides that where a partnership or business desires to incorporate, and does so within four months after the passage of this act, they shall be taxed as to net income as if the corporation had been in existence on January 1, 1921; that is, they shall be taxed as a corporation and not as a partnership or incorporated business.

An equalization of this character was put into the act of 1918 in reference to the excess-profits tax, and I think the amendment is perfectly fair and just. I have talked with the experts regarding it, and they say that the amount of loss of revenue is exceptionally small, less than $100,000, and that it is a perfectly just and fair request.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I think, however, it will bear a little inspection for the purpose of determining just what its operation would be. Gentlemen forming a partnership may have been in business 10 years, or 20 years, or only 1 year; but we will assume that they were in business as a partnership during the year 1921.

At the end of that year, or within four months beyond that, they ascertain that if they had been a corporation they would not pay as much tax; that the individuals owning the stock in that corporation would not pay as much had they conducted the business as a corporation. Therefore they ask, after ascertaining that they could save taxes by incorporating, to change their partnership to a corporation and have it react back as a corporation during the year 1921. Let us see what the reverse of that would be.

If we grant them that privilege, can we give any good reason why, if a corporation has been running during the year 1921 and at the end of the year the stockholders of that corporation ascertain that if they had been doing business as a partnership they would not have had to pay out in taxes as they are compelled to pay as a corporation, so they should not therefore be permitted to dissolve from a corporation within four months and organize as a partnership and get the benefit of the lesser tax by reason of being considered as a partnership when they were not a partnership.

The thing is just as long as it is broad. I know a good many partnerships; I know one myself in which I have an interest that would have been a great deal better off with the tax bill that we now have if we had incorporated a year or so ago, but I do not think it is just to wait until the end of the year, until we find out what the tax law is going to be, and then say we will change a partnership to a corporation or a corporation to a partnership, whichever may be the most advantageous to us, and ask that it be retroactive and apply to our income and our taxes for the preceding year.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Was there not a similar provision in the act of 1918?

Mr. MCCUMBER. There was for a few months; I think it lasted six months; but I believe it was hardly fair then.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator believe it was unfair then?

Mr. MCCUMBER. Oh, yes; it was unfair then, and doubly unfair now in a time of peace.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I have no desire whatsoever to ask the Senate Finance Committee to accept an amendment which in any way reduces the amount of revenue or is unfair to the Government. However, the bill is particularly harsh in relation to business and to corporations and partnerships. The surtaxes have been increased, the corporation tax has been increased, and there does not seem to be a disposition in the Senate to treat fairly corporations or partnerships, or business. It seems that every proposition which tends to equalize and which is fair is rejected. The experts who have guided and advised the committee during the entire debate on the bill have stated to me that this proposition is perfectly fair and just, and that it should be enacted into law; that a partnership which has been running for the year, expecting that surtaxes would be reduced, not being allowed by reason of this uncertainty to reorganize their business, suddenly finding that the declared policy of both parties has been changed, should at least be afforded this relief in order to reorganize their business affairs.

M . HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. When did either party announce that it proposed to reduce surtaxes?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have read in both platforms that a simpler form of taxes and reduced taxation was to be had, and that there would be a repeal of the excess profits law. I have heard that recited on the floor of the Senate time and again.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I asked the Senator when either party declared for a reduction of surtaxes.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not know when they declared for a reduction of surtaxes, but it was understood that there would be a simpler and more uniform tax, and that practically meant a sales tax and a reduction of the surtaxes and excess-profits taxes. However, that has nothing to do with this proposition. This proposition is perfectly fair and is the adopted policy of the 1918 law. I ask that it be incorporated now in the pending bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, this amendment has one feature that may be regarded by some as a merit. The Senator from New Jersey has just said that the bill is unfair to corporations and to partnerships. The Senator is in error. It is exceedingly unfair to individuals and copartnerships and it is more than fair to corporations. The bill is discriminatory against the partnerships and in favor of the corporations. I gave some data furnished to me by the actuary of the Treasury Department a few days ago showing that under the bill as now amended by the Senate a corporation will not pay as much as two-thirds of the taxes that a partnership doing the same business and earning the same amount of income will be required to pay.

Now, in that condition it would not be very unjust to permit a partnership to protect itself against that discrimination by incorporating. But for that situation I would not think of supporting the amendment. However, in view of the conditions that have been created by the bill, I feel that it would not be an inequity to permit copartnerships for this one year to meet this injustice by organizing themselves into corporations. I think that next year practically all the copartnerships in the country which are made aware of this discrimination against them will become corporations, and individuals will have the same incentive to organize their business into corporations, because under the terms of the pending bill and according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, individuals will pay income taxes twice as great as those of corporations, though doing no more business and engaged in the same kind of business.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from North Carolina a question?

Mr. SIMMONS. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. CALDER. I wish to inquire of the Senator if the amendment is agreed to and a partnership is incorporated under it as of January 1, 1922, will that corporation be required to pay excess-profits taxes for this year?

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course.

Mr. CALDER. What tax would the corporation have to pay this year?

Mr. SIMMONS. If it does not incorporate, it will not have to pay excess-profits tax, and if it does it will have to pay the excess-profits tax. So will individuals have to pay the excess-profits tax. However, that did not enter into my discussion.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator from North Carolina answer another question?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, we are not through with the bill yet and do not know what we will have when we get through with it, in view of the changes that have been made. Suppose before we get through with it somebody comes to the conclusion that the way it is finally framed is more favorable to partners than it would be to a corporation, would the Senator then be in favor of an amendment which would provide that the corporation might then dissolve and convert itself into a partnership and be allowed the benefits of the law as applied to partnerships for the whole of the previous year?

Mr. SIMMONS. If we make the corporation pay twice as much as we make the other taxpayers pay, I would say yes. I believe in equality of taxation, and I have so urged in every speech I have made in this body upon the subject. The three great groups of taxpayers are individuals, partnerships, and corporations. I believe it is an outrage upon the principle of equality of burdens to lay a tax of 20 per cent upon corporations and 40 per cent upon individuals and to lay a tax of 20 per cent upon corporations and a tax of 30-odd per cent upon partnerships.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator speaks of injustice. If there be any, it does not apply to this year, because the existing law continues for this year. What the Senator speaks of will begin only on the 1st of January of next year.

Mr. SIMMONS. The injustice will be very much greater next year.

Mr. LENROOT. Is the Senator's position, then, that under his own law a great injustice has been practiced against individuals and in favor of corporations?

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I do not undertake to say that, where they are paying the excess-profits tax.

Mr. LENROOT. They will pay the excess-profits tax until the 1st of January.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is true.

Mr. LENROOT. Therefore there is no injustice existing that the Senator now speaks of?

Mr. SIMMONS. Not the great injustice that will exist hereafter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the subject matter which has just been brought before the Senate is one which I think involves a very important matter of public policy. As the Senator from North Carolina has well said, if this situation continues much longer every business in the United States that can possibly do so will incorporate. There is no getting away from it. I do not know whether it would be possible for a firm of lawyers to incorporate, and yet it might. Certainly it is possible for firms of architects, engineers, and other professional men of that type to do so. Merchants and merchandizing firms will certainly incorporate.

I am wondering whether, from the broad standpoint of public policy, it is going to be a healthy condition of affairs to have finally eliminated from our industrial and business and professional life the element of partnership, containing as it does that very valuable element of individual initiative. We all know that the corporation serves a great purpose in the industrial and economic structure of the country, and that probably modern economic structures could not live without the existence of the device known as the corporation; but there is such a thing as driving that evolution along too fast and ending up with a state of affairs in which every business undertaking shall be incorporated.

May I just illustrate this difficulty which the Senator from North Carolina has mentioned with, I think, proper emphasis?

Let us take a partnership whose income, we will say, is $66,000. Under the revenue bill as passed by the other House, with the 32 per cent maximum surtax on incomes, that partnership would pay a tax of $15,000, which is a tax of 23 per cent. If it were a corporation, however, making the same amount of income, $66,000, the corporation would pay at the rate of 15 per cent, under the Senate bill, only $9,900—$5,100 less than a partnership making the same profit.

It grows worse as we go up in the scale of surtaxes. Supposing the partnership made $100,000, and 32 per cent was still the maximum surtax, that partnership would pay $29,000 in taxes, which is 29 per cent. If it were a corporation with the same income of $100,000, it would only pay $15,000 in taxes—$13,800 less than the partnership. If the Senate bill shall prevail with a 50 per cent maximum surtax on incomes, the situation becomes worse and worse in the way it treats a partnership.

Under those circumstances a partnership simply can not compete with a corporation doing exactly the same kind of business and making exactly the same amount of money. Sooner or later, Senators, something has got to be done about this; it can not go on in this way for two or three years more without transforming the business of the country from individual and partnership form into corporate form. Do we want that done as a matter of public policy?

The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] offers a certain kind of relief by making it possible for the partnership to transform itself, though it is a left-handed way of getting at it.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I wish to say with reference to the year 1921, I think that the disparity is not so great as it will be for the year 1922; it will be great for 1922. When we exempted corporations from the excess-profits tax for the purpose of bringing about a parity between corporations which were subject to that tax, while partnerships were exempted from it, the excess-profits tax was very high, and nearly every partnership would have paid a considerable excess-profits tax at that time; but as the excess-profits tax has dwindled until it is by comparison relatively insignificant but few corporations and few partnerships, if they are organized into corporations, would have to pay it.

The excess-profits tax now would not remove the disparity that it did remove in 1918 when we adopted that difference in favor of corporations.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is perfectly true. In 1918 the situation was abnormal. Even if we should retain the excess-profits tax, which we will not, we will never have the conditions of 1918 and 1919 repeated, except in the event of another tremendous world war, with the abnormal conditions which accompany such a war. So, as the Senator from North Carolina says, now that we have gotten back to some degree of normal conditions——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask for order in the Senate Chamber.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, for some time I have been trying to hear the debate, but a group has been gathered around the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] and we can not hear a word of the debate that goes on because of that group. I share the resentment which the Senator from New York must feel. I am interested in this debate, and I want to hear it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not feel any resentment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Why could we not make some arrangement whereby the private conferences would not interfere with the discussion in the Senate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why could not arrangements amongst Senators be made in the cloakroom or somewhere else without interrupting the proceedings of the Senate? There are some proceedings on the floor of the Senate that ought to be gone through with in spite of the private conversation in which Senators may engage.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I think I ought to say, out of courtesy to Senators who have been endeavoring to address the Senate, that we have been trying to agree on a unanimous consent for the disposition of the bill.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator from New York, to whom an apology is due, will allow me, we were trying to get a unanimous consent to put us out of our misery. [Laughter.] Will he allow me to present it? If I can be permitted to submit the request for unanimous consent, and if it is acceded to, the debate can go on in the quiet that surrounds a cemetery. [Laughter.] If there is no objection, I present the request for unanimous consent, which I send to the desk.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania presents a request for unanimous consent, which the Secretary will read.

The reading clerk read as follows:

When the Senate recess to-night, recess at 6.30 to meet at 10 o'clock a. m. Saturday; recess to meet 10 a. m. Monday; Monday after 3 p. m. limit speeches by any Senator to a total of 30 minutes; above to apply to everything except the bonus amendments. Vote on bill and all amendments not later than Tuesday 3 p. m.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, Tuesday is election day in my State.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is also election day in my State.

Mr. PENROSE. Very well; make it Wednesday.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. No.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Make it Monday!

Mr. PENROSE. Very well, make it Monday.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; we could not get through on Monday.

Mr. SIMMONS. Tuesday has been agreed to, I understand.

Mr. HEFLIN. I suggest that most of the Senators who go home to vote can get back here in the afternoon in time enough to vote if we should make it Tuesday night.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Senators who desire to do so can go home to vote; they are paired. I will ask that the Secretary state the request for unanimous consent again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The reading clerk read as follows:

When the Senate recess to-night, recess at 6.30 to meet at 10 a. m. Saturday; recess to meet 10 a. m. Monday; Monday after 3 p. m. limit speeches by any Senator to a total of 30 minutes; above to apply to everything except bonus amendments. Vote on bill and all amendments not later than Tuesday 3 p. m.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That fixes no time for taking a recess to-morrow night, and we can run along as long as we want to or as the occasion may require. The same statement applies to Monday.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I notice under the form of the agreement a Senator can have as long as he desires to speak on the bonus amendments.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Yes; that exception is made as to the bonus amendments.

Mr. MOSES. But we must vote by Tuesday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We must vote by Tuesday at 3 o'clock on the bill and all amendments.

Mr. SIMMONS. Without further debate?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Without any further debate after that time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Could we not vote on the bill to-morrow, if that should develop to be possible?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We concluded that we could not secure a vote earlier than at 3 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask what really serious objection there is to continuing the session to-night?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. It involves various explanations.

Mr. MOSES. Well, let us have them.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. One was that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] had an understanding with some other Senator that the other Senator was to go on with various and sundry amendments to-night. The other Senator was not willing or not able to go on, and so it was arranged as a matter of courtesy all around.

Mr. REED. I have no objection to running as late to-night as Senators may desire, provided the bill is not reported to the Senate to-night. I have no objection to going on with other amendments. Personally I should like to get away, but I will forego my engagement; and if the Senator from New York or any other Senator has an important matter that he fears might be cut off if we should recess to-night at 6.30, I am willing to go on. That provision in the request for unanimous consent may be changed, so far as I am concerned, but it should provide that when the Senate takes a recess to-night it shall be to meet to-morrow at the time stated.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Senators, permit me to say that we thought, in the interest of time, that the best thing to do was to come to some final conclusion and fix a definite time upon which a final vote should be taken; otherwise, if we should run over Sunday there is no telling when we will vote on this measure, for Sunday always breeds amendments on big bills of this kind. The only thing to do is to fix a definite time or else just to go on. We wanted to put it up to the Senate as to what they wanted to do. If the Senate wants to vote down this whole proposition and go on, running the risk of going on to-morrow and to-morrow night, grinding the thing through, well and good. We are making the best effort we can to come to a final conclusion respecting the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Do I understand that we are to vote on Monday at 3 o'clock or on Tuesday?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. On Tuesday afternoon at 3 o'clock; but after Monday afternoon at 3 o'clock speeches are to be limited to 30 minutes, except on the bonus amendment.

Mr. LODGE. After 3 o'clock on Monday the debate is to be limited to 30 minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Except as to the bonus amendments.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Why is an exception made in that respect?

Mr. LODGE. Because we want to get an agreement.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Because we could not get an agreement otherwise.

Mr. PENROSE. It is a subject affording an opportunity for too much eloquence to admit of limitation; that is the reason.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before I consent to the agreement, I desire to suggest that there are a number of Senators who wish to speak on the bonus proposal.

Mr. PENROSE. They will have a chance.

Mr. ASHURST. They will not have a chance, if the Senator will pardon me, under the arrangement proposed.

Mr. PENROSE. We will sit all night for them.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that all speeches on the bonus amendments be limited to three hours to each Senator.

Mr. PENROSE. That is too short a time.

Mr. ASHURST. Unless they are limited to that time some Senators will never be heard.

Mr. PENROSE. Three hours will be too short a time for each Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the limitation be placed on the speeches on the bonus, because otherwise there will be some of us who will never have a chance to speak on the subject; one Senator will get the floor and speak until the gavel falls. In the interest of fairness, I ask that there be incorporated in the agreement the provision that no Senator shall speak over three hours on the bonus.

Mr. PENROSE. We can stay here until the gray dawn creeps in the window, and still some Senator will be speaking on the bonus.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the reason I want the time limited.

Mr. PENROSE. It will be a magnificent sight. There is no need of limiting it; let the debate on the bonus go on.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the roll will have to be called to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, do I understand the request is that we shall recess to-night at 6.30 until 10 o'clock to-morrow morning?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Until 10 to-morrow morning; yes.

Mr. CALDER. I do not see why any limit should be placed on the session to-night.

Mr. PENROSE. That provision has been stricken out of the request for unanimous consent.

Mr. CALDER. I want it to appear in the RECORD that I will not be able to be here on Tuesday, and I have not as yet been able to arrange a pair for that day. I shall not object if an agreement can be obtained without my objection, but I do not like the idea of arranging for a vote on election day, when many Senators have important elections in their States and must be absent on that account.

Mr. PENROSE. Let us put statesmanship above politics, Mr. President. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harreld	Moses	Stanley
Brandegee	Harris	Myers	Sterling
Bursum	Heflin	Nelson	Sutherland
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Swanson
Cameron	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Townsend
Capper	Kendrick	Oddie	Trammell
Caraway	Kenyon	Overman	Wadsworth
Cummins	Keyes	Penrose	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	King	Phipps	Warren
Fernald	La Follette	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
France	Lenroot	Reed	Watson, Ind.
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Sheppard	Weller
Gerry	McCumber	Simmons	Willis
Glass	McKellar	Smoot
Gooding	McKinley	Spencer
Hale	McNary	Stanfield

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, if I may have the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania for a minute, this is a very important proposed unanimous-consent agreement. It is stated, as it was read by the Secretary, in a very fragmentary fashion. I should like to have the agreement—to which I have no objection myself—reduced to a form of English that will be proper for such occasions, so that it may be understood and stated in the English language.

Mr. PENROSE. The document may be remarkable because it is unusually terse and free from extra words and surplusage and repetition and prolixity. I ask that the Secretary read it again.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The reading clerk read as follows:

When Senate recess to-night, recess to meet 10 a. m. Saturday; recess to meet 10 a. m. Monday; Monday after 3 p. m. limit speeches by any Senator to a total of 30 minutes in the aggregate. Above to apply to everything except bonus amendments. Vote on bill and all amendments not later than Tuesday 3 p. m.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may I ask, for information, whether we are to understand that after 3 o'clock on Monday, if a Senator desires to discuss some amendment other than the bonus amendment, he may speak only 30 minutes?

Mr. LODGE. In the aggregate, on the bill and amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But if he desires to discuss the bonus amendment he may speak all day?

Mr. LODGE. Yes. The object, of course, is to reduce debate and promote a vote.

Mr. PENROSE. But all debate ends on Tuesday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Then, as I understand, if a Senator secures the floor at 3 o'clock on Monday to speak on the bonus question, and desires to do so, he can take the rest of the time, and no other Senator can speak on anything else in that interval.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Nobody else could get the floor if he had it and wanted to keep it and talk on that subject.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have been wondering why the bonus amendment is a preferred amendment in an oratorical sense.

Mr. PENROSE. It is a fertile field, and I think it ought to be given every show.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I will be very frank with the Senator from New York, and make this statement: In order to get any kind of an agreement we had to agree to that. If we did not agree to that we could not get an agreement at all.

Mr. PENROSE. And the Senator from New York can realize that he may have the virtues of the excess-profits tax uppermost in his mind, and he can apply his remarks to the bonus.

Mr. TRAMMELL and Mr. LENROOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest that the unanimous-consent agreement be amended so as to provide that no Senator shall occupy more than one hour on the amendment relative to the bonus. If we do not have a limitation of that kind on it, with the exception of two or three Senators who speak on the question of the bonus, no Senator will have an opportunity to say one word in regard to any amendment that he offers, regardless of the importance of that amendment. That is what it means. You might just as well say you are going to surrender all the time to the discussion of the bonus. While I want to expedite this measure, I do not like to expedite it by giving two or three Senators the opportunity to occupy all the time for debate from now until the vote is taken. That is what it means.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Make it two hours.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I said one hour. One hour is enough.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, experience has taught us that two or three Senators will get the floor, and, regardless of the rights of other Senators, will speak until the last minute, when the gavel falls. A large number of Senators want to be heard on this bonus matter. A large number of Senators here believe it ought to be agreed to; and it is unfair to us to arrange this unanimous-consent agreement so that others who secure the floor, and whose reputations for long-winded speeches are well established, will crowd out other Senators who are more modest in their speech making.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Question!

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suggest that qualification in regard to speeches on the bonus.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to suggest to the Senator from Florida that this agreement, as I understand it, proposes that a vote shall be taken not later than 3 o'clock on Tuesday afternoon. There are 96 Senators. If each Senator is to occupy an hour on the bonus, will that be consistent with the agreement to vote on Tuesday?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I did not make any such suggestion or intimation as that. I suggested that until 3 o'clock on Tuesday the speeches on the bonus should be limited to not exceeding one hour—I mean after 3 o'clock on Monday—and the vote is to be taken on Tuesday. That would not in any wise do away with the idea of expediting the final consideration of the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, if the Senator from Florida will permit me, it would not keep a Senator from speaking three hours to-morrow?

Mr. LODGE. Not at all.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It simply means that the Senators who had the good fortune to be recognized by the Chair would get in one-hour speeches.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President the limitation to which the exception is made in favor of the bonus amendment does not begin until 3 o'clock on Monday. Anybody can speak on anything between now and Monday—all night to-night, and all day to-morrow, and all to-morrow evening, and all Monday until 3 o'clock, before any limitation takes effect.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to ask if under that proposed unanimous-consent agreement a day is fixed for the taking of a final vote?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; 3 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. And any Senator can speak until that time?

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator will yield, after 3 o'clock on Monday, however, there is unlimited debate up to the time of the vote on Tuesday on the question of the bonus.

Mr. LODGE. There is.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Therefore, two or three Senators can talk three or four hours each, and no other Senator will have an opportunity to explain an amendment that he might introduce after Monday.

Mr. REED. That was not the purpose.

Mr. LODGE. That is not the purpose, certainly.

Mr. REED Mr President, the proposition we were discussing—and this was an informal memorandum that was made—was to allow ample time to discuss the bonus amendment, and to save enough time for other amendments of importance. There was no thought that after 3 o'clock on Monday a Senator could speak on the bonus any longer than he could on anything else. It was my understanding that up to 3 o'clock on Monday the speeches on everything would be unlimited—I am willing to put it in that way—and that beginning at 3 o'clock on Monday the speeches from then on should be limited to 30 minutes in all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, we do not quite understand on this side what the proposal of the Senator from Missouri was.

Mr. REED. I think Senators have raised a point which is valid as to this agreement—that it is susceptible of a construction which nobody had in mind. I am perfectly willing that the unanimous-consent agreement shall be so drawn that beginning at 3 o'clock on Monday all speeches on all subjects are to be limited to——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Thirty minutes.

Mr. WILLIS. Thirty minutes.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Make it 30 minutes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That will give us all a chance.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That will give everybody a chance. A Senator can make a long speech in 30 minutes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I should like to make an inquiry. Why not make that 30-minute restriction to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock? Is it the idea that a few Senators who want to speak more than 30 minutes will have the opportunity to speak more than 30 minutes prior to 3 o'clock on Monday, and that all other Senators who might want to occupy over 30 minutes on all of the amendments, the bonus and everything else, will be precluded from that privilege after 3 o'clock?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think if we could agree to limit speeches on the bonus to an hour each, the difficulties that we are laboring under now would disappear. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and I have introduced a bonus amendment. No speeches have been made on that yet, and none will be made until after the bonus amendment of the Senator from Missouri has been acted upon; but neither the Senator from Massachusetts nor I will want more than an hour. I shall not want more than 20 minutes myself, and I think the Senator from Massachusetts will not want more than an hour. Am I right about that?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. One-half hour.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think if we can limit speeches on the bonus to an hour, the objection to this unanimous-consent agreement will disappear. The apprehension is that the bonus will take up most of this time.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think that could be done, and I believe Senators would not abuse their privileges, by taking up the time which many Senators fear they will take, if speeches are limited to an hour.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is all right.

Mr. REED. Just a moment. Is it proposed to limit speeches on the bonus to an hour?

Mr. SIMMONS. It is proposed that no Senator shall speak longer than an hour on the bonus.

Mr. REED. Well, Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. After 3 o'clock on Monday.

Mr. REED. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement.

The reading clerk read as follows:

It is agreed that when the Senate shall take a recess to-night it will recess to meet at 10 a. m. on Saturday, and take a recess on Saturday to meet at 10 a. m., Monday; that on Monday, after 3 p. m., speeches by any Senator shall be limited to a total of 30 minutes in the aggregate, and this is to apply to everything except bonus amendments. On bonus amendments no Senator shall speak longer than one hour. The Senate will vote on the bill and all amendments not later than Wednesday at 3 p. m.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think it would be well to make the usual formal statement at the end, that at not later than 3 o'clock on Tuesday, November 8, 1921, the Senate will vote upon any amendment which may be pending and any amendment which may be offered, and upon the bill, H. R. 8245, through the regular parliamentary stages, to its final disposition.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That will be inserted in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. CALDER. I ask that the unanimous-consent agreement be modified so as to fix the time for voting at 3 p. m. on Wednesday.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, the Senator can kill this unanimous-consent agreement by objecting.

Mr. CALDER. I would be glad to have it made 10 o'clock Monday night. I shall not be here Tuesday.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. How many Senators are to be away on Tuesday to vote? I observe seven on this side.

Mr. KING. And two on this side.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I want to ask the Senator from Missouri if he would be willing to make the time for voting Monday night at 11 o'clock?

Mr. REED. I do not think it is possible to get through. I have tried to help as much as I can, and in agreeing to this I am going counter to a rule I thought I had established for myself, that when important bills were pending I would object to entering into unanimous-consent agreements. The situation is this: The bonus question will be brought up, and there are a number of Senators who want to speak on it. There is an amendment to be offered which the Senators presenting it want time to properly discuss. So much for that.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] has some seven or eight amendments to present, and the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who just had the floor, was discussing a question of very great importance. Whether or not he has an amendment to offer I do not know. I think that under the circumstances it would be impossible to get through Monday night; and one of the hopes I had was that we could avoid night sessions. If we can not reach an agreement that is satisfactory, we had better go on to-night and fight it out.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope we can reach a vote before Wednesday; I think that is too late. I think we ought to get through with this measure. Does not the Senator from Missouri think we might get through if we stayed here to-night until about 10 o'clock and to-morrow night until 8 or 9 o'clock?

Mr. REED. Yes; if we could go on to-night until 10. I think we are all trying to get through.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know that is true, and I want to have an adjournment myself; but for the purpose of getting a vote on the bill on Monday instead of waiting until Wednesday I would be willing to stay here to-night until 10 o'clock and stay here to-morrow night until 10 o'clock and stay here Monday night until 12 o'clock, if necessary.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why can we not vote on Wednesday at 12 o'clock noon? Why will there be such a tremendous difference between voting on Tuesday at 3 and voting on Wednesday at 12? That would allow Senators who are going away to vote in their States ample opportunity to get back and vote on the bill. It would not be fair to them to deprive them of a chance to cast their votes. We know they feel it necessary that they should vote in their State elections, and it is a patriotic duty for them to vote. I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if he will not modify his unanimous-consent agreement so that it will read to vote at 12 o'clock on Wednesday?

Mr. PENROSE. I will do that.

Mr. LENROOT. That would mean that we would take the entire day Wednesday. There will be a large number of roll calls.

Mr. McKELLAR. That may be true, but one day's difference is a great deal better than going on in this way.

Mr. LENROOT. I am unwilling to postpone it until Wednesday. I see no reason why we can not go on until a late hour to-night and vote on the calendar day of Monday. I am willing to do that.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest making it 10 o'clock Wednesday morning. Senators who care to vote can all be back by that time.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely satisfactory. Let us make it 10 o'clock on Wednesday.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I ask unanimous consent that the agreement be modified so as to fix the time for the final vote on Wednesday morning at 10 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. If we are going to run on all day Tuesday, there is no use putting the time limit of 30 minutes on speeches.

Mr. McKELLAR. We do not change that.

Mr. REED. Senators who have anything important to say will find that a very short time, if 8 or 10 amendments come up.

Mr. LODGE. We are extending the time until Wednesday.

Mr. McKELLAR. Until Wednesday at 10 o'clock.

Mr. REED. And the limit on speeches begins on Monday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. This extends the time from Tuesday to Wednesday.

Mr. REED. But the limitation of time still is to begin on Monday at 3 o'clock.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Let us go on.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let the bill be voted on Wednesday at 10 o'clock.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. We have made concessions in the interest of securing harmony and reaching a finality.

Mr. McKELLAR. Wednesday will afford Senators time to get here to vote, and they have that right.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, there are a number of amendments pending. It is my opinion that we have been making reasonable progress upon this bill and the amendments. This is one of the most important measures which this Congress will have to pass upon, and I am satisfied the discussion has resulted in much good. I do not believe anyone at this time can anticipate just what should be done. I do not know how many amendments are pending, but there are a number, and they ought to be discussed.

There is no evidence here of filibustering from any quarter. There are a number of questions reserved for action when the bill reaches the Senate, and there are a number of amendments which will be presented in the Senate. Under unanimous-consent agreements which we have entered into heretofore we have cut off debate, we have cut off the offering of additional amendments, so they could be discussed in the Committee of the Whole, making it necessary to bring them up in the Senate for presentation and discussion.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Does the Senator from New Mexico intend to object to the unanimous-consent agreement?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Then that ends it, and there is no use wasting time with a long speech. Objection is made, and I suggest that we go right on.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the pending amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN]. The question is on that amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. For a brief statement, Mr. President.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, we have made an honest effort to reach an agreement to vote on the pending bill. Objection has been made, and there is nothing for us to do now but to go on with the business in hand. I trust that Senators will remain here and we will go on as long as we can keep a quorum to-night and finish this bill at the earliest possible moment. It may be that some agreement can be reached to-morrow, but probably not to-night; at all events, I trust that Senators will remain.

There were many Senators on this side who objected to entering into this agreement, although they did not intend to object on the floor. They thought we ought to go on with the session to-night, and now that the unanimous-consent agreement has been denied, the only thing for us to do is to remain here and go on with the business in hand and finish it as soon as we can.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may an humble Democrat add his support to the position of the Senator from Indiana? I would like to see this bill passed to-morrow night, and see the Senate get through with it and get it out of the way, and I am willing to stay here all night if necessary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate long on this particular amendment, offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

When the unanimous-consent agreement was presented, I was endeavoring to discuss the matter of public policy in connection with this taxation of partnerships and individual concerns, as contrasted with taxation of corporations, and I had read to the Senate certain figures showing the exceedingly heavy burden carried by a partnership as contrasted with a corporation engaged in exactly the same business and making exactly the same net income.

One of the difficulties with arranging a scientific scheme of taxation on partnerships is the fact that the income tax assessed against a partnership under the law and under the regulations of the Treasury Department must take into account certain inventory values, and the most astounding injustices are inflicted from time to time by reason of that element in computing the tax that is to be paid. Apparently in corporate form business does not suffer that handicap.

A partnership may make a $100,000 in one year. The next year it may make only $10,000. In the year in which it makes the $10,000 it has to pay a tax on the $100,000. The third year it may lose money, and in the year in which it loses money it may have to pay a high tax on the profit which it made the year before. In other words, one of the most important elements in this difficult problem is this, that the profits of corporations and individuals engaged in business will vary tremendously from year to year, and if there were some way of arranging in the law for an averaging of the profits over a term of years, the individual or the partnership would not suffer so much.

For example, we will take a partnership engaged in a merchandising business of some kind. It may acquire a stock of goods during a taxable year a large portion of which is to be used in the business in the succeeding year. If it happens that during that taxable year the value of those goods has gone up on the market, as I understand the situation, the partnership will be charged, when it comes to pay its income tax, with the increase in the value of those goods. But when there comes a year in which a tax is paid several months later, the actual value of those goods may have gone down tremendously and be worth perhaps only 50 per cent of what they were in the year previous, which is the year for which the tax was to be paid. As a matter of fact, there are partnerships to-day facing bankruptcy by reason of the fact that the inventory values upon which the taxes are to be paid do not reflect and can not reflect in the slightest degree the actual values as of to-day, and when a partnership is faced with a condition of that kind, what is it compelled to do, if it can do so under the law, but to climb under the shelter of corporate form?

It has to do it. It may be able to stand the staggering tax once, but it can not take the chance of doing it again. Meantime, the same business in corporate form moves on smoothly and quietly and under the highest proposals of the bill can never be called upon to pay more than a tax of 15 per cent upon its income.

The amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey goes a little way, at least, in the matter of providing relief, and yet it is a form of relief which, frankly speaking, I do not like, because it is a legislative recognition of the necessity of partnerships to incorporate. I believe the whole situation created by the revenue bill in this regard is wrong. We ought to go back somewhere and find some method of equalizing the burden of taxation placed upon the partnership on one side and the corporation on the other, when they are doing the same kind of business and making the same profit.

The amendment of the Senator from New Jersey is a recognition by Congress, if the amendment shall be adopted, of the necessity of every partnership in this country incorporating. Should we compel partnerships to cease to exist as an important element in the business life of the United States? I may be a little bit old-fashioned, but——

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. GERRY. In other words, the Senator from New York feels that in this bill there is no parity between the individual, the copartnership, and the corporation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Why, of course not.

Mr. GERRY. And that the whole advantage is in favor of the corporation?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly; and everybody will be driven into that form of business and the Government is going to lose the revenue, and we might as well make up our minds to it. I discussed this matter on the broad ground with several Senators here, and have proposed a rather rough-hewn method of equalizing the discrepancy. The answer has been, and it is a perfectly legitimate answer so far as it goes, that if we are making some special provision in the bill for the equalization of burdens by, for example, authorizing a credit to be given to partnerships in the matter of the imposition of surtaxes or income taxes upon them, that the Government would thereby lose this next year a tremendous revenue. I have had that figure stated to me to be as high as $150,000,000.

I do not know what it would be. It may be that we would lose that amount or $100,000,000, or some very substantial amount, but we are going to lose it eventually, anyway, because these people will incorporate sooner or later, and we will lose that revenue from them no matter what we do here. There is no way that the Congress can forbid and prevent their incorporating. Certainly there is no constitutional or legal way of doing it, and from the moral standpoint it would be insufferable.

To-day individuals and partnerships are about the only elements left in our business life which are paying the full rates on income, and they are the ones, what there are left of them, who will have to carry three-fourths at least of the burden of that kind of taxation. I think the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in protest against this situation, is absolutely right. I am not satisfied that the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey presents the proper kind of remedy, because it is not a remedy looking in the direction of the fundamental difficulty. It merely opens the door for these people to go to corporate form. In other words, as I said a little while ago, it is recognition of the fact that we are compelling them to do it, and if we are going to compel them to do it, let us let them do it right away and make it somewhat retroactive.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am very much in sympathy with the argument which the Senator from New York is making. This afternoon I introduced an amendment, which is now being printed, which provides for a plan whereby the individual in business and the copartnership in business may make a return as a corporation, and by another amendment, by simply changing the word "such" to "any," I have provided that the corporation may make a return as a partnership. In other words, what we are all seeking—and I know it is in the mind of the Senator from New York—is to bring about equality of taxation——

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. So far as it can be done. That is the purpose of my amendment. The Senator from New York deprecates the idea of forcing individuals and copartnerships to incorporate, and unquestionably he would deprecate the idea of forcing corporations to disincorporate if the form of business which they have built up meets with the wishes and desires of the people who are conducting the business. The amendment which I proposed this afternoon meets just that situation. It provides for a method whereby the individual or partnership may make a return as a corporation, suffer only the burdens of the taxation which is imposed upon the corporation, and that the corporation, composed of a few individuals, if they find that the burden is greater upon them as such, may make a return as a partnership.

What we are all after—and I must say I express my supreme gratification for the argument which the Senator from New York has been making—is equality of taxation. I have not heard the amendment proposed by the Senator from New Jersey, but it just occurs to me that perhaps this matter might be deferred until the amendment which I have proposed this afternoon may be printed, and that we may all consider it on its merits.

The suggestion has been made to me that if partnerships and individuals are overtaxed we should let them incorporate. That is not the solution in my judgment. I am much gratified that the Senator from New York is making the argument which he is making.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I merely wish to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will yield the floor in just a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York declines to yield for that purpose at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am very much interested in the amendment which the Senator from New Mexico has offered. It may be that it presents the best-balanced automatically working solution. It is susceptible of such a result. I also offered an amendment this afternoon, which is being printed, but is not yet printed, which may be regarded as somewhat roughhewn, as I said a little while ago. It is an effort, perhaps desperate, to equalize the situation, and it reads as follows. I have not yet offered it formally in the Senate to be considered and voted upon because I want it printed first. It reads as follows:

For the purpose of the taxes imposed by this section the taxpayer shall for the calendar year 1922—

It is not applicable to this year at all—and each calendar year thereafter be allowed a credit equal to 30 per cent of the net income from a trade, business, or profession carried on by him, or from salaries, commissions, fees, or other compensation for his personal services. Such net income shall be separately computed for the purposes of this section under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary.

That 30 per cent is sort of a rough estimate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How did the Senator arrive at 30 per cent?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In figuring the way the different taxes run on copartnerships on the one side and corporations on the other side, when we pass incomes of $66,000 the differentials seem to run about 30 per cent. It gets worse as it gets higher.

I am rather taken with the suggestion of the Senator from New Mexico. I am not at all prepared to say that mine is good or anywhere nearly as good as his proposal, but I bring the matter up in connection with the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey, because the Senator from North Carolina opened the door to one of the most interesting topics I have heard presented in the Senate since the bill was under consideration, and I thought, while we had started the discussion on it, that at least there would be a few Senators willing to give consideration to the very point to which I have called attention.

Mr. GERRY. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Are we going to compel the incorporation of practically all the business enterprises and nearly all the professional enterprises of the United States?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. That is just what it does.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield now to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. GERRY. I simply wish to say that I have been very much interested in the discussion of the Senator from New York. This matter had been under consideration by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and myself when we suggested certain amendments. The Senator from Massachusett brought in his amendment which would tax corporations on their net earnings on a graduated scale. That amendment was rejected. One of the reasons for that amendment was that it would have evened up in some slight degree this inequality between the individuals, the copartnerships, and the corporations. Undoubtedly this inequality exists, and it exists a great deal more since the Senate has adopted the higher scale of income tax.

It seems to me that there is a great deal of merit in what the Senator from New York has said. A difficulty, however, in the rectifying of the injustice in the way he proposes is in regard to the loss of revenue.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is revenue we are going to lose within a year anyway.

Mr. GERRY. Yes; but we would not lose it so soon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My amendment does not let it take effect until next year.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator's amendment does not apply until 1922. Is that the calendar year or the fiscal year?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The calendar year.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken. The amendment to which he refers as offered by the Senator from Massachusetts would not correct the inequality between corporations and partnerships and individuals. I did not understand that was the purpose of it. The purpose of that amendment was to correct inequalities between corporations which are paying excess-profits taxes and corporations which are paying no excess-profits taxes, the corporation of small earnings as compared with the corporation of large earnings. That was the purpose of the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GERRY. Yes; that was the main purpose, but I am not mistaken.

Mr. SIMMONS. It would not correct this other difficulty.

Mr. GERRY. It would correct it in a slight degree. It would not equalize it.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not understand that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts would impose in the aggregate any heavier taxes upon corporations than the committee amendment. The amount of revenue from that amendment would be about the same, as I understand it, as from the committee amendment, but the inequality between weak corporations and strong corporations would in a degree be corrected.

Mr. GERRY. I think the Senator from North Carolina missed my point. It would not, as far as raising an increased amount of revenue, equalize the difference, but it would have the effect of placing a tax of 20 per cent on very large profit-making corporations, which would in a small way tend to equalize the surtaxes paid by individuals.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, a few moments ago upon a call for a quorum we had in the Chamber nearly all the Senators who are in the city. In five minutes the Chamber was practically empty. The Senators are away to their dinners, which is a very proper thing. Now we are asked to vote upon an important proposition of this kind with a dozen Senators or less in the Chamber. We are asked to discuss it when we have nothing but empty seats to discuss the matter with, and then Senators will come in and vote according to some preconceived idea they may have or accordingly as they have their confidence in this Senator or that or as they wish to please this one or that one, instead of voting upon anything they know anything about. I am not going to let the matter go to a vote at least without some explanation of the argument that has been made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. There is no such thing, Mr. President, as equalizing the taxes which are paid by a corporation and those paid by a partnership. It is an impossibility, for the reason that the individuals composing the partnership must pay their taxes, normal and surtaxes. When we attempt to equalize what shall be paid by a corporation, we have got to take into consideration what the stockholders are going to pay. The corporation does not spend the money for pleasure or for anything of that character; it does not spend it for family uses. Take the case that the Senator from New York has presented to the Senate of a partnership earning $66,000. Now, I presume the Senator based his calculation on what they would pay upon such a division that each one would earn $66,000. Is that correct?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; that was the total amount.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then there would be $33,000 for each partner, if there were but two of them. They pay their surtaxes upon that if they have earned it all, and it is divided.

Now, let us take the corporation. Let us take a case where two men, with a dummy to represent the third man, owning the same amount of property, conducting the same kind of business, make the same amount of money as a corporation. What do they pay? First, they pay the corporate tax of 15 per cent upon their net income. The Senator from New York did not mention that in his argument.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes; I did.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Secondly, the Senator did not mention the fact that the members of the corporation pay in addition to that a tax upon their corporate stock.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is small.

Mr. McCUMBER. That depends entirely upon what their stock is. It may be small or it may be large, but they have got to pay it. Suppose they distribute the money that they have earned, then each individual would pay relatively upon the distributed share. In the particular case cited if a corporation composed of individuals distribute its earnings, when the individual interest is considered it has paid a great deal more to the Government than would a partnership. But, Mr. President, that seems to me not to be reaching the real case after all, because in the corporation there may be a good many stockholders.

If there be a great many stockholders, the individual holders having to divide the $66,000, perhaps none of them would pay more than a very small amount to the Government of the United States. They are not the kind who will want to convert themselves from a corporation into a partnership or from a partnership into a corporation. This proposed legislation will affect those cases, in my opinion, where there are one or two partners or where there are two or three holders of stock.

The whole thing hinges, to my mind, upon whether we ought to say that at the end of a year a partnership may incorporate in order to escape partnership taxes or, on the other hand, if it be a corporation, that it may dissolve and thereby escape paying corporate taxes and pay only as a partnership. My insistence is that such a provision as that now before us ought not to be retroactive.

I agree with the Senator's statement that there should be allowed both to the corporation and to partnerships the right to retain a reasonable amount of their earnings in the business. I have always favored that and would vote for it, but the proposition of making such a provision retroactive and allowing either a partnership or a corporation to determine at the end of the year whether they will escape the taxes by incorporating or by dissolving, as the case may be, seems to me to be inconsistent with good legislation.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico and Mr. WADSWORTH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield and, if so, to whom?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield the floor to all Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I did not intend to discuss this matter at this time, but I desire to say that what I believe we all want is equality of taxation. The Senator from North Dakota in his statement has evidently kept that idea in mind. However, so long as we have a different plan for taxing corporations from the plan for taxing individuals and partnerships who are engaged in business, we are bound to have inequalities in a very large number of cases; there is no question about that; and in some instances it reaches up to hundreds of thousands and even into millions of dollars.

We do not want to disturb the forms of business which the people have adopted. If they think that it is better for their interests to operate as individuals or as partnerships or as corporations, we do not want to interfere with that. We do not want to force a reorganization of the business interests of the country. We want the people to transact their business just as they have chosen to do, and legislation ought to be so arranged that they can do that without suffering any additional burdens of taxation.

The Senator from North Dakota has said that it will not do at the end of the year for a partnership to determine whether or not it will make a return for that year as a partnership or a corporation; that it will not do at the end of the year to allow a corporation to make a return as a partnership if that would be better for it at that time. I think I agree with the Senator about that, and the amendment which I proposed takes care of that situation; but it does provide that the partnership may elect as to whether it wants to continue its business as a parnership, as a corporation, or as an individual; and it gives the corporation the right to elect whether it will continue its business as a corporation or as a partnership for the purposes of taxation.,

This question was presented by me to the experts of the Treasury Department, who have been rendering most admirable assistance to the Finance Committee, and after considering it they concluded that if it would be better for the individual or partnership to incorporate let him do it; that if it would be better for the corporated stockholders to disincorporate, let them disincorporate.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator would not have it retroactive, would he?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is a question I have not considered. My amendment does not contemplate any retroactive feature.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose two men in a partnership have a million dollars of income each; the Senator would not allow them to form themselves into a corporation and pay 15 per cent on that, would he?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am inclined to agree with the Senator from North Dakota upon that proposition. The question of making it retroactive has not been considered by me, and the suggestion of the difficulty presented by the Senator from North Dakota appeals to me very much. I should like to hear the Senator from New Jersey or some one upon the question of making it retroactive.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Gladly.

Mr. CALDER. Does the Senator's amendment give the taxpayer, whether an individual or a copartnership, the right at the end of any given year to make his return as a corporation?

Mr JONES of New Mexico. It gives him the right whenever he makes his return to elect at that time so that he will make his return——

Mr. CALDER. As of that year?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As of the year for which the return is to be made.

Mr. CALDER. Is not that retroactive?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It is retroactive to that extent; yes.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico if in his consideration of this question he has taken into account the advantages and the disadvantages that may result from corporate or partnership or individual conduct of a given business? Let me put the matter in this form: A corporation is subject to State laws and subject to State exactions, for, as the Senator knows, many States impose very heavy taxes upon corporations, first upon incorporation, then a franchise tax, a capital stock tax, etc. Then consider the 15 per cent tax imposed by this bill upon corporations on profits and the corporation stock tax. Then take a partnership conducting the same kind of a business, and assume that the profits of the corporation at the end of the year are $100,000 and that the profits of the partnership are $100,000; has the Senator figured whether the corporation or the partnership would pay the most taxes to the Government and to the State, and whether it would be more profitable, the partnership making a hundred thousand dollars and the corporation making a hundred thousand dollars, to operate the business as a partnership or as a corporation, taking into account the State taxes, the State corporation taxes, the Federal corporate taxes, and all taxes imposed by this bill?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I have made no investigation with respect to the State obligations of corporations, because they vary in the different States; but I have investigated the subject with respect to the Federal laws only and to the proposals of this bill as they bear upon individuals, partnerships, and corporations, and this is the necessary result: This bill proposes to put a flat tax of only 15 per cent upon corporate income, in addition to the capital-stock tax, of course, which is comparatively immaterial.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am compelled to leave the Chamber, and inasmuch as this is my amendment, and a very important amendment, and as there has been so much interest taken in it, I shall ask, or request the Senator from New York to ask, unanimous consent that it go over until to-morrow. I shall not make that request until after the Senator from New Mexico concludes his remarks, for, of course, I do not want to interrupt the Senator in his argument on the amendment.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I presume we are all perfectly willing that it may go over. I shall join in the request, because at that time we may have the other amendments ready.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I desire to have the merits of the amendment considered carefully by the Senate, and I think it is better, in view of its importance, that a full attendance be here when the matter is voted upon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I might say to the Senator that if by any possibility we should get through with the bill as in Committee of the Whole to-night, he would still have an opportunity of presenting the amendment in the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey, which is that the amendment be passed over for the present?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, does not the Senator think we could obtain a quorum here to-night?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Possibly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Then why not consider and act upon the amendment?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from New Jersey desires that it go over until to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But why can we not dispose of it to-night? I had understood that the Senator from North Dakota was going to keep the Senate in session to-night.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from New Jersey has an immediate engagement that he desires to keep, and if he is delayed until we get a quorum here he will be greatly inconvenienced.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to say that if this were an engagement that could be broken I should feel that it was my duty to stay here. I know that the Senator from Washington is smiling because I have stated to the Senate that I am compelled to leave, but it is an engagement which I do not feel at liberty to break, in view of its importance. Therefore, as I introduced the amendment, I ask that the matter may go over until to-morrow. If there is objection, the Senate can vote upon it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator as to why I was smiling is not correct. I was not smiling on that account at all. Of course I should not expect to have the Senator break the engagement of which he speaks for an opportunity to vote on his amendment; but I was rather glad of the opportunity to suggest that we were informed that we were to be kept here to dispose of amendments, and that it might be well to try to get a quorum here to dispose at least of the other amendments. I am glad to have the amendment of the Senator go over.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not suggest that we stay here to-night.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no; I was not referring to the Senator at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Mexico has the floor.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I think I will proceed with my remarks.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understood that the Senator from New Mexico had completed his remarks.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. No; I have not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will ask the Senator, then, to yield to me. I was going to say that if the present amendment goes over I should like to offer one myself.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have it stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield for that purpose?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I will ask the Senator to withhold it for a moment, until I conclude the answer which I was making to the interrogatory of the Senator from Utah.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator declines to yield at this point.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The interrogatory of the Senator presents a question which is the crux of this whole proposition. Here is what will be the operation of the bill as it is now presented to the Senate.

Take an individual engaged in business. He must pay not only the normal tax but the surtaxes upon his income for the year, whether that income is represented by goods upon the shelf or wheat in the bin, or what not. That is all considered as income. The corporation pays a flat tax of 15 per cent upon its income. Whenever the income of the individual engaged in business reaches a point where his normal tax and his surtaxes will exceed 15 per cent and the capital stock tax, whatever that may be, he will have an inducement to incorporate. That point is reached under this bill whenever the income of the individual is as much as $20,000 a year. When you reach the point of $20,000, from $18,000 to $20,000, the surtaxes are 7 per cent. He pays a normal tax of 8 per cent; so when he reaches an income of $20,000 a year he then is put upon a parity with the corporation, ignoring the small tax upon the stock issue of the corporation. That is the point where he will have an inducement to incorporate. As the Senator from New York has said, they may talk about the loss of revenue by permitting that individual to return his income as a corporation, but the loss will occur, as the Senator very correctly points out, because these people are not going to suffer this great injustice. Whenever you reach the point where the tax upon the individual doing business as an individual is greater than he would pay if he organized as a corporation, he is going to do it, and they are going to suffer this loss in revenue whether they want it suffered or not.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator in his presentation has omitted one or two factors, one of which I alluded to and which he states he did not take into account, namely, the impositions of the States; and let me say to the Senator that they are very great. May I further add that some of the States now are imposing a tax upon alleged intangible assets of corporations which are becoming almost confiscatory. They have not, so far as I know, applied that rule of taxation to individuals or to partnerships, and yet they may in the future extend that principle of taxation, which is so nebulous as to work, in my opinion, very serious hardships upon the taxpayer. However, there is that factor which must be imported into the equation in order to reach rational and just conclusions.

There is another factor not mentioned by my distinguished friend, namely, that the individuals, if they should incorporate and distribute to themselves as dividends the profits made, would be compelled to pay perhaps surtaxes and certainly the normal taxes upon the distributions made by the corporation. That would have to be taken into account, because that would detract from the amount which ultimately would be left in the pockets of the individuals.

Then there is another factor which must be taken into account, namely, that after the corporation pays all of its taxes to the States for intangible assets and good will, and what not, and then 15 per cent to the Government, and its capital-stock tax, then when it distributes as dividends the profits made the various stockholders of the corporation will have to pay an income tax to the Government. So that a corporation operating will be compelled to pay very large sums to the Government; and if a complete computation were made of a business conducted by a partnership, with profits of a million dollars per annum, and a business conducted by a corporation with profits of a million dollars per annum, when you take into account all of the advantages and the disadvantages upon each side of the line, I am not so sure where you are going to get off, and I am not so sure that the corporation would have any advantage over the partnership.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have made note of everything the Senator from Utah has just stated. The difficulties of changing from a partnership or an individual business to a corporation have been pointed out by the Senator from Utah. They vary with the legislation of the different States. That will affect only the point reached in income where the inducement will arise to change from the individual form of business or the partnership form of business to the corporation. It may be that in the Senator's State there are so many taxes on corporations—stock taxes and franchise taxes and various kinds of taxes—that they would deter individuals and partnerships in his State from incorporating; but the point will be reached, even in his State, assuming it to be the one which surrounds corporate forms of business with the greatest difficulties, where there is greater advantage in operating as a corporation than as a partnership; and if the Senator will just take the other side of the proposition, if there are so many difficulties surrounding the doing of business as a corporation in his State, coupled with this flat 15 per cent tax upon all of the net income of corporations, the corporation may find it to its benefit to disincorporate and do business as a partnership.

The point which I present is, Why disturb these forms of business which the taxpayers of the country have selected as the forms of business most appropriate to their surrounding circumstances? Why force them to change from one to the other in either direction because of Federal taxation? Why can we not provide that Federal taxation at least may be permitted upon either basis, according to the selection of the taxpayers of the country?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator propounds that as a question, I want to assert that in my opinion it would be not only an injudicious but a most unjust assertion of Federal authority to compel business enterprises to adopt forms different from those which have been followed in the past and which business prefers to follow in the future. It would be reprehensible—indeed, it would be infamous—for us to use the taxing power of the Federal Government to compel business to change from legitimate paths which have been walked in for years and years to follow some avenue which we indicate that they should walk in.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I felt that I would touch a responsive chord in the heart and intellect of the Senator from Utah, because I know that he does not want to disturb business and that he does not want to discriminate, so far as Federal taxation is concerned; and that is precisely what this bill does as it is now proposed. You make individuals and partners engaged in business pay a normal tax of 8 per cent, and you levy your surtaxes. The higher their net incomes, the greater the rate of taxation is, and when they reach the point where they are making incomes in excess of $20,000 a year, you are putting a penalty upon anybody who is undertaking to do business as an individual.

I say that it is indefensible, and no one has undertaken to defend the proposition on the floor. It can not be done. The thing that has been suggested is that the exigencies of the situation demand that these taxes shall be levied, but no one has undertaken to justify this gross discrimination.

Take a corporation, which is earning modest dividends, composed of two or three stockholders. Assume that there are three stockholders engaged in a moderate business. They are making modest incomes, incomes amounting to only 5 or 10 per cent upon their invested capital. If they were to disincorporate they would pay taxes only at the rate probably of 5 or 6 per cent upon the net income which would be the property of each individual stockholder; but if you require them to remain as a corporation, you tax them a flat 15 per cent, and you will force the corporation composed of a reasonable number of individuals to disincorporate and do business as a partnership.

Do you want to disarrange the business of this country through a mere system of taxation? Is that the purpose of this legislation? Of course, no one wants to do that; but they undertake to build up a system of taxation. They have one system for individuals and partnerships and another system for corporations. If you do not want to do injustice to the business of this country, then why should you not provide a plan whereby the individuals or the partners may make a return as a corporation and whereby the corporation, through the unanimous consent of its stockholders, may make a return as a partnership?

I submit that there is no substantial argument against that proposition. That was embodied in the amendment which I introduced this afternoon. I did not expect the matter to come up for discussion to-night, but the amendment of the Senator from New Jersey necessarily raised the general proposition. I am glad that it has gone over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I am not willing that an amendment so important as this shall be voted on with less than 10 Senators in the Chamber.

Mr. CURTIS. It was the understanding that the amendment should go over.

Mr. KENYON. I understood that agreement was not entered into.

Mr. CURTIS. That is so, because the Senator from New Mexico did not yield for the purpose, but the understanding with the acting chairman was that the amendment would be withdrawn.

Mr. KENYON. I did not understand that that was the arrangement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR] offered an amendment, which might be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Jones, N. Mex.	McNary	Sutherland
Brandegee	Jones, Wash.	Moses	Townsend
Calder	Kenyon	Myers	Trammell
Cameron	Keyes	Oddie	Wadsworth
Capper	King	Overman	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Ladd	Phipps	Warren

The principal legislative clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. NICHOLSON answered to his name when called.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. BURSUM entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Only 42 Senators have answered to their names, and a quorum is not present.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will execute the order of the Senate.

Mr. NORBECK, Mr. REED, Mr. KENDRICK, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. NEWBERRY, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. GOODING, Mr. BROUSSARD, Mr. GLASS, Mr. POINDEXTER, and Mr. HARRIS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent to vacate the order by which the Sergeant at Arms was directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. ASHURST. To vacate the order?

Mr. CURTIS. At present. We will issue another order later, if it is necessary. We want to go on with the amendment to be proposed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the order will be vacated.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which the Secretary has at the desk, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Tennessee offers the following amendment:

On page 171, after line 25, insert:

"Section 22 of the interstate commerce act is amended by inserting "(1)" after the section number at the beginning of such section and by striking out all after the first proviso of such section and inserting at the end of such section two new paragraphs to read as follows:

"(2) Each common carrier by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, within the continental United States subject to this act, shall issue interchangeable nontransferable 2,000-mile tickets (including the privilege of carrying baggage free to the amount of 100 pounds), to be sold at the rate of 2½ cents a mile, for transportation of persons on any lines of such carrier or any other such carrier, without regard as to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey are within the same State, provided such carrier is engaged in interstate commerce. The commission, by order, (a) may initiate and establish such classifications, regulations, and practices relating to such tickets, (b) may make such regulation as it deems necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this paragraph, and (c) shall modify the rate established by this paragraph whenever in its opinion there is, after this paragraph takes effect, a substantial alteration in the average rate level for the transportation of persons by such carriers throughout the country as a whole, so as to increase or decrease such rate directly in proportion, as nearly as the commission deems practicable, to such alteration in such average rate level and without regard to section 15a of the interstate commerce act, as amended by section 422 of the transportation act approved February 28, 1920. Any ticket unused in whole or in part at the time of any such modification may be redeemed at the same rate per mile as that for which it was purchased. No common carrier shall demand, collect, or receive greater or less compensation for the transportation of persons or baggage under any such 2,000-mile ticket than that required by the provisions of this paragraph or any order of the commission issued thereunder or refuse to accept any such ticket for the transportation of persons as provided in this paragraph.

"(3) If any provision of paragraph (2) or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of such paragraph and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstance shall not be affected thereby, and no tax shall be imposed upon mileage tickets issued under this paragraph."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which the Secretary has at the desk, and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. The Senator from Tennessee offers the following amendment:

On page 171, after line 25, insert:

"Section 22 of the interstate commerce act is amended by inserting '(1)' after the section number at the beginning of such section and by striking out all after the first proviso of such section and inserting at the end of such section two new paragraphs, to read as follows:

"'(2) Each common carrier by railroad, or partly by railroad and partly by water, within the continental United States subject to this act shall issue interchangeable nontransferable 2,000-mile tickets (including the privilege of carrying baggage free to the amount of 100 pounds), to be sold at the rate of 2½ cents a mile, for transportation of persons on any lines of such carrier or any other such carrier, without regard as to whether the points of origin and destination for any single journey are within the same State, provided such carrier is engaged in interstate commerce. The commission, by order, (a) may initiate and establish such classifications, regulations, and practices relating to such tickets, (b) may make such regulation as it deems necessary for the enforcement of the provisions of this paragraph, and (c) shall modify the rate established by this paragraph whenever in its opinion there is, after this paragraph takes effect, a substantial alteration in the average rate level for the transportation of persons by such carriers throughout the country as a whole, so as to increase or decrease such rate directly in proportion, as nearly as the commission deems practicable, to such alteration in such average rate level and without regard to section 15a of the interstate commerce act, as amended by section 422 of the transportation act approved February 28, 1920. "'(3) If any provision of paragraph (2) or the application thereof to any person or circumstance is held invalid, the validity of the remainder of such paragraph and the application of such provision to other persons and circumstance shall not be affected thereby, and no tax shall be imposed upon mileage tickets issued under this paragraph.'"

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, under subsection (i), on page 171, there is a provision in the present tax law governing the redemption of mileage tickets. The amendment now offered is almost in the identical words of a bill that was introduced several months ago by the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], with only very small differences, to which differences I shall call the attention of the Senate in a moment.

It has been about a year since I introduced in this body a bill to provide for the issuance of mileage tickets. The traveling men all over the country have asked for the issuance of such mileage tickets. Business men all over the country have asked for such a provision of law; and it seems to me that it would be of the greatest importance not only to the traveling public, not only to the business public, not only to that part of the public that is known as traveling men, but it would be of the greatest interest and value to the railroads themselves. I believe that it would mean largely increased passenger revenues to the railroads, a matter in their present state of vital importance; and one of my reasons for saying this is that prior to the taking over of the railroads by the Government and prior to the passage of the act known as the Esch-Cummins bill, the railroads of their own accord issued this kind of a mileage ticket. They have been in common use ever since I can recall, and that is some time now; and if they had not been of value to the railroads, if they had not been to the financial interest of the railroads, they never would have been issued. So, I believe that it is intensely desirable not only for the good of the public that may buy these railroad mileage tickets but of the utmost benefit to the railroads themselves, because with the same amount of rolling stock they will have a very largely increased number of passengers in the country and a largely increased revenue. The commercial travelers are a unit in demanding this legislation. Each one of these traveling men is also a business getter for the railroads. Every time one goes out and sells a bill of goods he makes additional business for the railroads. Every one of them is in reality a drummer for business for the railroads. Before the war and before the Esch-Cummins law the railroads recognized this fact and gave them reduced mileage tickets. This system, if reestablished, would manifestly benefit the railroads.

Now, going back just a moment over the history of this measure, as I say, I introduced it about a year ago, the first one—I believe it was the first—to be introduced. Last spring I reintroduced my bill at the opening of the special session of Congress, and immediately asked the distinguished chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee [Mr. CUMMINS] for a hearing, and he appointed a subcommittee, at my request, so that a hearing might be had. He said he favored legislation of this kind. He was exceedingly sympathetic in regard to the matter. The subcommittee appointed consisted of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], the Senator from Maine [Mr. FERNALD], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I tried on several occasions to get the subcommittee together, and did succeed finally in getting them together on the floor here once. In the meanwhile the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] had introduced his own bill on the subject and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] had also introduced a bill on the subject; but when I found that the Senator from Indiana had introduced a like bill, it seemed to me to be of the utmost importance that we consider his bill. He was on the Interstate Commerce Committee—he was a member of the majority party—and I urged the subcommittee to consider this particular bill of the Senator from Indiana, which I think is a most excellent measure. I immediately expressed myself as being just as much in favor of Senator WATSON's bill as I was in favor of my own. Of course, I knew the political situation, and knew the committee would want to report a bill introduced by a member of the majority party. I wanted the legislation. I therefore supported the Watson bill. The only differences between that bill and the present amendments are three, which I will point out in a moment.

As I understand, the subcommittee did report the Watson bill favorably to the full Committee on Interstate Commerce. I will not be positive about that, but I so understood. Whether or not the full committee has acted upon it, I do not know; but from what I heard from the various members of the committee, a large majority of that committee favored the Watson bill. I think I at one time or another urged every member of the committee to support the Watson bill. It just happened that the distinguished Senator from Indiana is not only a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee but he is a member of the Finance Committee, and if this amendment is added to the pending bill it will be virtually in his hands when it comes to conference, because I understand that he will be a member of the conference committee; so any small differences about it can be ironed out in conference, and I hope the committee will accept the amendment. I want to say to him in all frankness that it looks to me like a mighty good way for him to get his bill passed at a very early date. The commercial travelers and the traveling public in Indiana are just as much in favor of it as those in Tennessee and in the remainder of the country are in favor of it. It is not my bill I am urging; it is the bill of the Senator from Indiana. There never was such an opportunity for him to get his bill enacted into law. Will the Senator help me with his own bill? I see the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee here also. I am going to point out the changes, the very minor changes, I have made in the Watson bill, and I believe they will meet his approval.

The Watson bill, which I have before me, provides for the issuance of 5,000-mile tickets. My amendment provides for the issuance of 2,000-mile tickets. I think the 2,000-mile ticket is very greatly preferable to the other, and my reason for saying so is this: The public is used to buying a 2,000-mile ticket or even a 1,000-mile ticket. It is not used to buying a 5,000-mile ticket.

The great body of commercial travelers are not men of large means, and it would mean a greater imposition upon them to be compelled to buy a 5,000-mile ticket rather than a 2,000-mile ticket, or a 1,000-mile ticket; and I hope that change in the amendment which I have offered will be satisfactory to the chairman of the committee and to the members of the committee and to the Senate. The 2,000-mile book is a compromise between the 5,000-mile book and the former plan of the railroad companies by which they issued 1,000-mile books. If it is preferred by the Senate to make 1,000-mile books that would be entirely acceptable to me.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Why should the Senator prescribe the sale of 2,000-mile tickets alone? Why not make it 1,000 miles, so that people who do not travel constantly may get some benefit of this provision and not be discriminated against?

Mr. McKELLAR. I should be perfectly willing if a 1,000-mile ticket could be issued, and, in fact, I would rather have it; and I will say that the railroads themselves felt that a thousand-mile ticket was better, because that was the ticket usually sold prior to their being taken over by the Government following the declaration of war.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. I am thoroughly in sympathy with the purpose of the amendment which the Senator is describing, and I believe in the wisdom of it thoroughly. In fact, as the Senator has already said, I have introduced a bill along this same line.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I have it here before me. It is an excellent bill, too, and I hope to have the Senator's aid in enacting the policy into law while we have a real chance.

Mr. SPENCER. What I should be very glad to have the Senator tell me is in the discussion of a bill to reduce and equalize taxation and to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, where does general legislation in regard to interchangeable mileage tickets have its place? I like what the Senator has in mind, precisely as I am in favor of added appropriations for the inland waterways; but where is the application of either one of them on the bill now before the Senate?

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall be delighted to tell the Senator. It is a very simple matter. I read from subsection (1) of the present bill:

(1) Subdivisions (a), (c), and (d) shall not be in effect after December 31, 1922. Under regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary, refund shall be made (1) of the proportionate part of the difference between the tax collected under subdivisions (c) or (d) of the revenue act of 1918 on tickets or mileage books purchased and only partially used before January 1, 1922, and the tax imposed on and after such date by subdivisions (c) or (d) of this act; and (2) of the proportionate part of tax collected on tickets or mileage books purchased and only partially used before January 1, 1923.

At the present time there is a tax on mileage books or any other kind of railroad transportation which will be in force till January 1, 1922, at any rate. This amendment of mine repeals the present tax law in so far as mileage books are concerned. It is perfectly appropriate to this bill. If we declare that mileage books are a class of railroad transportation and repeal the tax on them beginning with the approval of the bill, such a provision has a perfectly legitimate place on this bill. There can not be any possible doubt about that. Besides, this is not an appropriation bill, and general legislation can be adopted on such a bill as this. No point of order can lie to this amendment. It is purely a question of whether it is desired by the Senate to vote for this amendment or not. It is up to you Senators on the other side of the aisle. You have the opportunity to adopt it or defeat it. I hope you will vote to adopt it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. A question only. What amendment does the Senator propose? Is it the one that bears his name? Is it some modification of that amendment?

Mr. McKELLAR. The amendment which the Senator has is the pending amendment. It is my amendment proposed to this bill, but it is Senator WATSON's bill, not mine. It provides at the end that no tax shall be imposed upon this kind of railroad transportation. There is now a tax on this kind of railroad transportation, and there is no reason why it may not be added to this bill.

If the Senate will bear with me just a few minutes, I shall take only a short time before I ask for a vote; and I will now point out the other differences.

Mr. SPENCER. Does the Senator think that because in the pending bill there is a provision in regard to the revenue as it is affected by the evaporation which occurs in the case of stored liquor that perhaps we might work in the inland waterways appropriation?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all; I think that the Senator's illustration has no bearing at all, if the Senator will excuse me for differing with him.

Mr. SPENCER. I am inclined to agree with the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. Incidentally, I might agree, as suggested here by a distinguished Senator by my side, that in these days no liquor evaporates; it is all consumed. I am afraid this is unhappily so, though I am not an expert on that subject.

The second change I will call to the attention of the author of the bill [Mr. WATSON of Indiana] and the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce [Mr. CUMMINS] is found in line 4 of the amendment which the Senator has before him. This proviso reads:

Provided, That such carrier is engaged in interstate commerce.

Mr. President, I understood from what I heard in the committee room of the Committee on Interstate Commerce one morning while I was in attendance upon it about this matter, and from what some member of the committee told me afterwards, that there was some question about whether there was a constitutional right to deal with this matter, as it affects railroads entirely within a State. Of course, we all understand that that is a legal question, and for that reason I put a proviso in this amendment that such carrier must be engaged in interstate commerce. In other words, I think the amendment, regardless of what might have occurred in the committee, ought to provide in terms only for mileage tickets in interstate commerce.

Mr. CUMMINS. Every railroad in the United States, so far as I know, is engaged in interstate commerce. No matter how short it may be, it carries or originates carriage which may terminate outside the State. That is true of both passengers and freight, and of all such carriers the Interstate Commerce Commission has jurisdiction. The question in dispute is a very grave one, and is a question upon which we are now, and have been for more than 10 days, holding hearings, in view of an effort being made in certain bills which have been introduced to repeal certain parts of the transportation act which are claimed to have extended the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission over intrastate commerce. I take it that it can not be claimed that Congress has any power to give the Interstate Commerce Commission or any power to exercise for itself the authority to regulate a purely intrastate rate. There must be some association of the State rate with an interstate rate in order to bring it within the authority of Congress, and very plainly one part of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Tennessee would attempt, at least, to assume Federal jurisdiction over State passenger rates, no matter how disconnected they might be with interstate commerce.

Mr. McKELLAR. I know of no greater expert in the United States on these rates than the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], the chairman of the Committee on Interstate Commerce; and if he would sit down at his desk and draw an amendment to this amendment I would ask leave to perfect my amendment by incorporating his words in it, because I agree with him that we ought to be careful not to take any more jurisdiction in this bill than we should. However, judging from the opinions of the Supreme Court, I have not a particle of doubt that the provision in this amendment, which is, as I have said, practically the bill introduced by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], will be upheld by the Supreme Court.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have very grave doubt about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will just indicate the language which he thinks will remove the doubt, I shall gladly accept his language.

Mr. CUMMINS. I can not conceive of circumstances under which a rate between two towns 10 miles apart in the State of Tennessee would affect interstate commerce, unless we are willing to go to the length of saying—and this is one of the very questions now being considered by the Supreme Court in a case yet to be decided—that State rates, no matter whether they are connected with or whether they affect interstate commerce in any way at all or not, can be controlled by the Federal Government in order to insure that purely intrastate commerce or transportation shall raise its proper, fair share of the burden which must be borne by the carriers who do an interstate business. I have never been willing, myself, to say that the Interstate Commerce Commission or Congress should attempt to fix State rates simply because it was alleged that State rates did not raise the revenue which that part of the traffic should raise; and the Senator from Tennessee can see at once that this amendment puts all State passenger traffic entirely in the hands of Congress first, and afterwards in the hands of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that I should be delighted to accept any amendment which will effect the purpose he has just explained. I will strike out any language he thinks might interfere with the State rates or I will insert any other language he thinks will safeguard the matter. My only desire is to see enacted into law this bill introduced by the able Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON]. I think this legislation is greatly needed.

Mr. CUMMINS. It would not be difficult to make the change suggested by the Senator from Tennessee; but I do not think we can include that class, for the reason that while I am in favor of giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to require railroads to issue interchangeable mileage tickets, which may be used without destination upon the various interstate carriers of the country, I could not and do not favor the establishment of a uniform rate throughout the United States by Congress. I think it would be fatal, not only to the best interest of the traveling public, but to the carriers as well. As the Senator from Indiana knows and as the Senator from Tennessee knows, I am in favor of conferring authority upon the commission to require railroad companies, so far as interstate travel is concerned, to issue interchangeable mileage tickets upon application, but I am not willing to say that they shall be issued at 2½ cents per mile. The Senator from Tennessee can easily perceive the difference between those two propositions, and, therefore, if I were to attempt to write an amendment to his amendment I would have to rewrite the amendment entirely. That I can not do at this time. Moreover, while I recognize that the committee of which I am chairman has more work to do than has been possible to accomplish on account of the engagements of Senators elsewhere, I think this is a matter which should be settled by an amendment to the interstate commerce law through an independent measure, so that it can receive the consideration in the Senate which its importance demands. I do not think this legislation should be made a part of a revenue bill, and for that reason, while I am always at the service of the Senator from Tennessee, I can not do what he has so kindly suggested that I might do.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not know that I subscribe to the position the Senator from Iowa takes about the 2½-cent mileage. There is a proviso in the Esch-Cummins bill, of which he was one of the coauthors, which provides that all railroads shall earn 5½ per cent, and it directs the rates to be so fixed and established by the Interstate Commerce Commission as to bring about that result in the various rate districts.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no such provision in the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is substantially it.

Mr. CUMMINS. It will not bear the construction which the Senator from Tennessee has just put upon it; and I may say, in regard to that, that the hearings which we are now conducting, and which we have been conducting for 10 days, upon the bill introduced by the Senator from Kansas and the bill introduced by the Senator from Colorado relate to that very subject, and it may very well be that within a very short time a bill will be reported and passed which will eliminate that provision in the law.

Mr. McKELLAR. It strikes me that under the provisions of the Esch-Cummins law, which provides, among other things, that if railroads make more than a certain percentage the excess is to be set aside and used for the benefit of other railroads which do not make so much, a provision of 2½ cents per mile straight throughout the country would not be a hardship on any railroad. I do not see how it could be.

There is another proposition about this. The Senator says for us to wait. We have been waiting a year to get action on this proposition. I introduced a bill embodying this subject last fall. I have constantly, in season and out of season, asked that the bill be given a hearing, and that we might have a report on it. When I found that Senators on the other side of the Chamber had introduced similar measures, realizing the situation and knowing bills by majority Senators would naturally receive preference, I at once put mine aside, having no pride of authorship, and urged the passage or the favorable report of the bill offered either by the Senator from Missouri or the Senator from Indiana, particularly that offered by the Senator from Indiana, because he was a member of the Interstate Commerce Committee. I have tried in every way to get meetings of the committee and of the subcommittee in order to get the bill favorably reported. My friends on the other side of the aisle will bear me out in this.

The Senator says wait. How long is the traveling public to wait? It has been waiting and suffering a long time already. Passenger rates, as well as freight rates, are enormously high. They are an enormous burden upon the business of this country. They are an enormous burden upon the traveling public, and some action ought to be taken to reduce them. Are we going to wait until another session and another session?

Are we to wait until the next session, and then the next, and when that session comes then the next? Are we to wait indefinitely for something which I believe nine-tenths of the people of the United States think we ought to have now? As far as I know, no Senator contends that these mileage tickets should not be authorized. I have not found a Senator who differed with me on that proposition. Yet we are just procrastinating day after day, the public is suffering, and business is falling off. The merchants of the country can not send out the usual number of traveling men. The traveling men are not able to pay the enormous rates which are asked of them for traveling. The railroads are not only losing a large increase in their passenger traffic, but they are also losing an enormous increase in their freight business which would naturally come from having a greater number of traveling salesmen getting increased business for them.

As an illustration of what their high rates are doing, I came up not long ago on a train, and there were three people in the sleeping car between Memphis and Washington on what is known as the Memphis special. I asked the Pullman conductor, whom I know very well, why it was that there were so few in the car, which is ordinarily crowded in both lower and upper berths. He said, "You people in Congress are to blame for it." I said, "How are we to blame for it?" He said, "You have raised the rates so high that the people can not travel on the Pullman as heretofore; we get no drummers now; they can not afford to ride with us any more." They are charging Congress with it, you see. I said, "You can not charge me, because I have done everything in the world I can to get rates reduced, and voted against the Esch-Cummins law, under which they were raised, thereby damaging both the railroads and the public."

I know the Senator from Iowa will bear me out about the reduction of passenger rates, because I have talked with him about it time and time again, and he has the same general views on the subject that I have. Immediately after I introduced the bill he told me that he agreed that something of this sort ought to be done, and that these mileage tickets providing for lower rates of travel should be issued.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not question that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Everybody says it ought to be done, but nobody does it. Here is an opportunity for it to be done right away. There is no real reason why it should not be done immediately. It is the same plan formerly adopted and used by the railroads themselves. It is a large increase on former mileage-book rates. The cost of labor is coming down. It has already been materially reduced. The cost of materials is being greatly reduced. It will bring a large increase in the volume of business with a consequent increase of income to the railroads. The railroads need this increased revenue. I do not know of anything that would cause a greater increase of passenger business than the reduction of rates provided for in this proposed sale of mileage books.

Mr. CUMMINS. I was very much interested in it, and the Senator from Tennessee knows that when his bill was introduced I asked him to name a subcommittee to consider the bill which he had introduced. The Senator from Tennessee suggested the names to me, and I as chairman appointed them.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is entirely true. The Senator has acted with the utmost courtesy and consideration, and I am absolutely sure is conscientiously in favor of proper remedial legislation. The only thing I complain of is that we are not getting anywhere. That was nearly a year ago, and now the whole country is demanding cheaper passenger rates, and still neither the committee nor the Senate acts. This we all know is a good way to get them, and it seems to me that here is a means in a bill that has been considered. If it is not exactly right, the conferees can arrange it after it goes to conference.

Here is a bill that was certainly carefully prepared, otherwise the Senator from Indiana would not have introduced it. It is most carefully prepared. I do not say that because it is my amendment, because it is not my amendment. I am, as I said before, introducing as an amendment the bill of the Senator from Indiana precisely as he introduced it, with the few exceptions I have mentioned which are immaterial. I wish to call the Senate's attention to one of these inconsiderable changes, because it will come up before the Interstate Commerce Committee unless the Senate should adopt my amendment. In line 17, on page 2, I have added these words, after directing the Interstate Commerce Commission to issue the mileage under regulations:

> And without regard to section 15a of the interstate commerce act, as amended by section 422 of the transportation act, approved February 28, 1920.

That is important for this reason: The Interstate Commerce Commission, as long as the provision exists about raising the rates to a point where they will produce a certain income to the railroads, will regard it as mandatory unless we provide by law that they shall do this without regard to section 15a, which directs the Interstate Commerce Commission to raise the rates so that the income of the railroads shall be not less than 5½ per cent in groups. I think this is quite important as an amendment.

The other difference between the Watson bill and the amendment which I have offered is the tax provision exempting these mileage tickets from taxation. Of course, it is proper that we should do that. We have exempted from taxation all transportation after the 1st of January. If it is proper in this bill to exempt it after the 1st of January, it is entirely proper to exempt it at the present time.

Mr. President and Senators, I have said about all I care to say about this amendment. I merely wish to add that to my mind this is one of the most important steps toward bringing about normal business conditions in the country. The rates of travel are so high that they are stopping the business of the country. They are drying up the business of the country. It seems to me it is our duty, while we are in session and while the matter is properly before us, to take that step which we all realize right now, and which all know ought to be taken.

We all know that lowering the mileage rates and thus increasing the issuance of mileage books is a wise thing to do, because it is not only to the interest of the public but it will be to the interest of the railroads themselves, and their interests ought to be looked after. We know that they are having a serious time. They need every dollar they can earn. They adopted this method of handling their passenger traffic. It is a system established by them. From time immemorial they have issued these mileage books at less than their regular rate. So we are not attempting anything new or revolutionary. We are attempting to do by my amendment what the public wants done and what the railroads by habit and experience for many years have declared is the proper way of handling it. We all believe in it. I doubt if there is a single Senator who does not believe that we ought to have a lesser rate for mileage books, that we ought to provide for a system of mileage books at lesser rates. If that is the case, why do we insist upon technicalities? Why do we insist upon presenting it to a certain committee, or why do we want to do anything else about it other than to accept what the Senator from Indiana has himself said ought to be the law? He is on this committee, and if there are any amendments to my amendment, after it goes into conference they could be suggested and looked after there. Will he help us pass his own proposal?

Why should we delay it? It would be a very popular provision in the bill to include this very amendment which I have offered. It will be one of the most popular things about the bill, and, by the way, I think Senators on the other side will need some popular provisions in the bill.

There are a world of provisions in the bill that you are going to find will be excessively unpopular with the American people. Why not put in a few things that will serve the people? The people will feel that they are getting something direct when they are able to go and get mileage books at reduced rates. We have taken the taxes off of transportation after January 1, 1922. This will undoubtedly help some. The cost of labor has been reduced. The cost of materials has been reduced. Why not a reasonable reduction in freight and passenger rates?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia and Mr. CUMMINS addressed the Chair.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will yield to the Senator from Georgia because he rose first, but I will ask him to let me finish this statement first.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. McKELLAR. When they find that the provisions of the bill have been changed, that where they formerly paid, as they do now in many instances, about 5 cents a mile all told, they can now buy mileage tickets at reduced rates, they will feel that it is a very excellent piece of legislation. I say it is not my legislation and it is not legislation that comes from this side of the Senate. It is the proposal of Senator WATSON of Indiana. I am only asking Senators on the other side to incorporate this in the bill at an appropriate place under appropriate circumstances, side by side with appropriate provisions, it being the very law that some of your most distinguished Members have said ought to be on the statute books. It is a proposal of one of your most distinguished leaders.

Will you do it or will you postpone it? Did you mean what you said when you stated you thought these rates ought to be reduced, or are you just side-stepping the proposition? Let us have a show-down about it. Give a yea-and-nay vote on it. I do not know whether I shall be able to get a yea-and-nay vote. I know that when you do not want to do anything, you do not give us a yea-and-nay vote. I do not know that we have enough Democrats here to-night to get a yea-and-nay vote, but give me a yea-and-nay vote and let us see how we come out on it. I should like to see how the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] will vote on his own bill. I should like to see how the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] will vote on substantially his own bill. Are you going to stand by the commercial travelers and the traveling public generally, or are you going to postpone, postpone, postpone to a more convenient season that may never come?

I promised to yield to the Senator from Georgia and then——

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield the floor?

Mr. McKELLAR. No, not yet; I desire to yield to the Senator from Georgia first.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I wish to point out to my friend from Tennessee that the travel in his State and mine and every other State is local travel. Most of the commercial travelers and drummers work within the State boundaries. Not only will a drummer spend his whole life canvassing a State and never go outside, but very often the State is divided up into territories, and two or three or four drummers representing the same local concern will cover the State.

Now, the Senator and myself and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] made a strong fight in the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads to preserve for the States the control of the roads, and we won that fight. Is not the Senator from Tennessee now unconsciously going in an opposite direction, when he wants to turn over to the Federal Government the control of the railroad rates inside of our State?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; not at all. We all know what controls the passenger and freight rates of the country. It is not the State commissions, but it is the United States Government through the Interstate Commerce Commission that really fixes all rates in this country. I say that the proposition that has been submitted by the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], is immaterial in this aspect of the case. The moment the Interstate Commerce Commission, under the direction of Congress, reduces the rate on interstate travel, every State commission in this country will fall over itself to make a like reduction of State rates. The people are demanding a reduction of freight and passenger rates all over the country. Of course I can not prophesy, and I do not pretend to, but it is my judgment that every State commission will at once reduce the rates over which they have control and in accordance with the rates fixed by the Congress through the Interstate Commerce Commission, if we authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to reduce them.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. I did not desire the Senator to yield to me. I want him to yield the floor if he is through. I desire to be recognized in my own right.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not yield the floor. I do not yield to the Senator at all under those circumstances.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is just one question I desire to ask the Senator from Tennessee. How does he know that 2½ cents a mile is a fair, reasonable, and just rate? What study has he given to the question that will enable him to declare legislatively that 2½ cents a mile is fair, just, and reasonable under existing conditions?

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say that prior to the war the cost of mileage was 2 cents a mile. We are reducing the wages of our railroad labor. The labor board has already reduced them in part and are going to reduce them again probably. The cost of materials is greatly less, and there is no reason in the world why 2½ cents a mile would not be a reasonable compensation. That is based on experience, and I believe that the revenues of the railroads will be infinitely more when the rates are reduced than they are now under the present exorbitant rates.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I observe is that the people are suffering very severely from high rates, but they are suffering vastly more on account of high freight rates than they are on account of high passenger rates. Our first duty is to reduce the rates on freight and not the passenger rates.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator that freight rates ought to be reduced, but it is equally necessary to reduce passenger rates. These provisions of the Esch-Cummins bill have done more to bottle up the business of the country than any law that was ever put upon the statute books. I said it would be so in the spring of 1920. I so stated on the floor of the Senate when that bill was up for consideration then and have said so again and again. I fought that bill with all the vigor of which I was capable. I felt sure that if that bill became the law the business of the country would be well-nigh stopped, and the result has shown that what I said about it at the time has been absolutely fulfilled.

I say to the Senator that I, perhaps, get more letters from my State urging the repeal of the Esch-Cummins law than as to any other law that was ever put upon the statute books.

Mr. CUMMINS. I differ entirely from the Senator from Tennessee upon that point.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator knows, if he will permit me——

Mr. CUMMINS. Let us go on and see what we can do toward reducing freight rates before we legislate upon passenger rates.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will recall that the present high freight rates and the present high passenger rates were all provided for and authorized under the Esch-Cummins bill of 1920.

Mr. PHIPPS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee yield to me for a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. PHIPPS. While it may be that railroads in a populous State like Tennessee may exist by collecting 2½ cents per mile as a mileage rate, does the Senator think that in less favored sections like my own State, which is mountainous and sparsely settled, and where to-day the railroads can barely eke out an existence with a passenger rate of from 4 to 6 cents per mile, and an average of 5 cents per mile for passengers, it would be fair to the railroads to insist that they accept interchangeable mileage at the rate of 2½ cents per mile?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I will say that I have traveled all over the State of the Senator from Colorado, from east to west and from north to south; I believe I have been over every foot of it where there is a railroad; and I traveled at just a trifle over a cent a mile. Why, your State is the product of cheap railroad rates! The railroads when they were issuing tickets of that kind were vastly more prosperous than they are to-day under the provisions of the Esch-Cummins law, with their rates entirely out of all reason. Your State was more prosperous then than it is now. One of its chief industries is entertaining tourists. When you have cheap railroad rates you have many tourists. Under high rates, as now, you have few tourists. Of all Senators in this Chamber, the Senator from Colorado should, in the interest of his own State, be for this amendment.

Mr. PHIPPS. I should like to have had the Senator's "pull" with the railroads of my State, because, although having lived there some 20 years, I know I can not travel at such rates as he has stated.

Mr. McKELLAR. It does not require any "pull" whatsoever. One simply had to buy an excursion-rate ticket through the Senator's State. There is no State in the Union that permits more travel on its railroads on excursion rates than the Senator's own State. The railroads were delighted to sell excursion tickets. Instead of having a "pull" the agents of the railroads in the various eastern cities came around and solicited the privilege of selling cheap rates through the Senator's State. These rates were a great boon to the Senator's State. In the interest of his own State he ought to help pass this amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I shall yield in one moment. The Senator's State has been largely built up by low passenger rates, under which the people of the remainder of the country have traveled in the Senator's State. The Senator is unfumiliar with the railroads of his own State when he talks about their not being able to exist on lower rates.

Mr. PHIPPS. If that is the Senator's impression, Mr. President, I do not care to take the time to endeavor to enlighten him.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. I wish to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question in all seriousness. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] has referred to conditions in his own State. I happen to know that there is a small railroad that runs up Pikes Peak. I assume the Senator from Tennessee has been over it?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator think he has sufficient technical knowledge to advise the Senate that that railroad could be maintained on a rate of 2½ cents a mile?

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; and I am not trying to do it.

Mr. POMERENE. I should say not.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not trying to do that at all. That is an inclined railroad purely local in character. My amendment would not apply to it. By the way, when the railroads get a passenger out to the Senator's State, and he goes up an incline, he is charged very much more for that service. It is good business and very profitable.

Mr. POMERENE. May I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator feel that he has technical knowledge enough to enable him to say that, without endangering the financial prosperity of the New York Central, 2½ cents a mile would be enough for that road to charge?

Mr. McKELLAR. I can say to the Senator in answer to that question that the New York Central road was more prosperous when it charged a 2-cent fare than since it has charged the present fare. There can be no question about that.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course we all know, talking about technical knowledge, that if we wait to bring about this much-needed reform, this admittedly much-needed reduction of rates, until we get so-called technical knowledge, we shall never reduce them, and the country will be in the same bad condition forever that it is now in under the provisions of the Esch-Cummins law.

Mr. POMERENE. No, Mr. President; and it is due to the lack of technical knowledge on the part of some men who have been managing the railroads in the name of the Government that the railroads are in their present condition.

Mr. McKELLAR. I leave that to those who know more about it than I do. I do not know.

Mr. POMERENE. Very well. The Senator has repeatedly discussed this matter in the Senate, and never once has he said one word on the question as to whether or not there should be any decrease in wage.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; I have. The Senator surely has not been listening to my remarks.

Mr. POMERENE. Or in the cost of material or in anything of that kind.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have just said that there ought to be such a decrease and there has been. Of course, the Senator from Ohio was not listening or he would have heard what I said about that a while ago; that there had already been a decrease in costs of materials and in wages and that there would be other decreases in costs and in wages. There have been enormous decreases in the matter of the cost of railroad material. The Senator was not listening or he would have heard me state that. However, I am not going into that part of the question. Here is a proposition on which we can vote now, and if no other Senator wishes to discuss the matter, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee asks for the yeas and nays. Is the demand for the yeas and nays supported?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, no one more deplores than myself the present state of our transportation. I have been on the Interstate Commerce Committee for perhaps 10 years, and I think I have been a reasonably close student of the subject. I have given some thought to passenger rates and some thought to freight rates; but, notwithstanding my 10 years of study of that subject, I want now to confess to the Senate that I do not know what would be a proper rate on cotton in the South or on wheat or corn in the West or on lumber in the Northwest, or what would be a proper rate for passenger traffic in any section of the country; at least I do not comprehend it to the extent that I am willing to have the Congress of the United States say, as a matter of law, that 2½ cents per mile on the more than 500 railroads of the country will yield sufficient revenue to keep this road out of bankruptcy or lead that road to prosperity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. Just a moment, please. Mr. President, for some reason or other—I do not know why it is—I am not able quite to understand how some men who have not given any detailed study to this problem are willing to impose their judgment upon a transportation system that is worth from eighteen billion to twenty billion dollars without a careful study of the receipts and expenditures and without the aid of skilled rate experts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. There never will be a Congress of the United States that will understand this question to the extent that it will be enabled to prescribe the rates.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. POMERENE. In just a moment. I would not attempt to do it unless I had at my elbow several able rate experts.

Now, Mr. President, what does this proposal mean? It is a very popular measure; there are many traveling men who want this kind of legislation at this time; there are many men who would like to have a passenger rate of 1 cent a mile; so would I if I knew how to maintain the railroads; but what is this going to lead to? The Senator refers to the provisions of the Esch-Cummins Act. I understand, of course, that men are ready to find fault with legislation when perhaps they have not read it. Constantly men are talking about there being a 5½ per cent guaranty or a 6 per cent guaranty. There is no such guaranty under that law.

Then they tell us, "Oh, I know that all of these rates have gone skyward since the Esch-Cummins Act was passed." My God, do we not know that there has been a war? Do we not know that we have not yet adjusted all of these matters?

Mr. McKELLAR. And do we not know that the war is over? [Laughter.]

Mr. POMERENE. No; the Senator from Tennessee does not know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Rates are up; the wages are up; and during the last year the $18,000,000,000 or $20,000,000,000 of railroad property only earned $63,000,000, which means three-tenths of 1 per cent on the investment in the railroads.

But it is said that the rates are prescribed as they are because of the provisions of the Esch-Cummins Act. The Esch-Cummins Act provides that there shall be a fair return on the property; the Esch-Cummins Act recites in substance that in the judgment of the Congress of the United States, for a period of two years to the end of March 1 next, 5½ per cent would be regarded as a fair return.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. If they can make it.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; if they can make it; and that the Interstate Commerce Commission may in its wisdom increase that another one-half of 1 per cent, the proceeds of which shall go to the betterment of the railroads and shall not be distributed among the stockholders. Is there anything wrong about that? It may be news to the Senator from Tennessee if I were to say to him that in the making of these rates members of the Interstate Commerce Commission have said that at no time have they taken into consideration the amount of return which was prescribed as permissible in the Esch-Cummins Act.

I do not know what is to be done about this matter. We can go on and make these rates if we wish. Is anybody disturbed as to whether or not the railroads will have a proper balance at the end of the year? Seemingly not; and when we adopt a law like this amendment, fixing a rate for passenger traffic, we will have another rate asked for cotton, another rate for wheat in the West, another rate for corn, another rate for iron ore, another rate for steel, another rate for automobiles. Oh, this can all be done, but does anybody suspect Congress of having enough wisdom to determine it? Shall we do this in a haphazard way?

Mr. President, this is a matter that is not to be spoken of jestingly. It is not to be decided offhand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the Senator is correct about that, and that we can have a yea-and-nay vote, because that is the way to determine how Senators actually feel about it.

Mr. POMERENE. I am quite sure they have been persuaded by the technical knowledge the Senator has given, and that they will be able to form a judgment about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is exactly the same kind, I imagine, that led the Senator to vote for a 5½ per cent income. He said he knew nothing about it, and yet he voted for a 5½ per cent income for the railroads. How did he find that out?

Mr. POMERENE. That is just about as loose a statement as the other statements the Senator has made from time to time. A traffic rate is one thing; a rate of return on investment is quite another.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was a record vote.

Mr. POMERENE. It does not go into the question of rates. At a time when money was being loaned at 8 per cent throughout the United States everywhere, and sometimes at 10 per cent, and money could not be borrowed in the banks for 5 or 5½ per cent, we said that in our judgment 5½ per cent would be a fair return for a period of two years.

Mr. McKELLAR. And directed that the rates be raised so as to bring in not less than 5½ per cent. That is what I said.

Mr. POMERENE. They had the power to do that, but the Interstate Commerce Commission never did it.

Mr. McKELLAR. A great many people think that they did even more than that.

Mr. POMERENE. If the Senator wants some knowledge on the subject, let him go down to the Interstate Commerce Commission and ask them about it.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I will come around and talk to the Senator in the morning.

Mr. POMERENE. I could give the Senator a little information on that subject, I think.

Mr. President, why should this bill be loaded up with legislation of this kind? The Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] has referred to the constitutional question that is involved. Let us assume, for the sake of the argument, that a traveling man wants to go from the city of Columbus, Ohio, to Dayton, Ohio, both points in the same State, purely intrastate business: How can you expect that road to be compelled to take an interstate mileage coupon? More than that, the Interstate Commerce Commission are charged with the fixing of all rates on freight and on passenger traffic so as to give a reasonable return. How are they to do this and distribute the charges equitably among all kinds of traffic, if the Congress of the United States is to say that the rate on one kind of traffic shall be thus and so? Do not forget that when we establish the precedent of fixing passenger rates, it will be followed up by efforts to fix freight rates as well.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. Let me call the attention of the Senator to how equitably they distribute rates. A carload of melons was shipped from a town in my State to Pittsburgh, Pa. It sold for $586.70, and when the railroads and the commission merchant got their share of it the farmer got $38.20. That shows the equitable way in which they distribute rates.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator has given an illustration of what happens once in a while.

Mr. CARAWAY. In the way of equitable rates?

Mr. POMERENE. I have said nothing about equitable rates as applied to freight; but I know that 25 years ago and more, when I was actively engaged in the practice of the law, I found a good many instances in which fruits were sent from Florida to the markets in my section of the country to some commission merchants, some of them honest, some of them dishonest.

Some of them would try to sell the load of fruit or of vegetables or of produce, as the case might be, and when it would come to making an accounting to the consignor there was not enough to pay the freight. I do not think the Esch-Cummins law was in existence at that time.

Mr. CARAWAY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. POMERENE. I yield.

Mr. CARAWAY. It happened that the commission merchant took only 10 per cent. Of all the produce that was shipped from that section of the State, the transportation company this year got from 65 to 90 per cent of what it sold for in the market.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I do not know what the market conditions may have been at the place where the produce was sold. No one has ever heard me say one word in favor of the maintenance of the present rates. I recognize that generally speaking they are too high. I think that in many instances the passenger rates are too high. What I am saying now is that I have not the technical knowledge to enable me to say how much too high they are. That is the point.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that my very able and distinguished and genial friend over there from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who has said by this bill what he thought the rate ought to be—a Senator who is serving on the Interstate Commerce Committee, a man of large experience, and of very, very varied and very splendid legislative experience—knew something about it when he fixed the rate at that figure?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana must determine for himself and state his reasons for presenting this bill, just as the Senator from Tennessee has given his reasons. My contention is that the Senators who are called upon to vote upon this subject have not the technical knowledge that they ought to have in order to cast an intelligent vote upon this subject.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent from the discussion that this matter can not be disposed of without considerably more debate. It has absolutely nothing to do with this bill. I therefore move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas moves to lay the amendment on the table. The Senator from Tennessee suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harreld	McKinley	Simmons
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Spencer
Broussard	Hitchcock	Moses	Stanley
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Sutherland
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Norbeck	Swanson
Cameron	Kendrick	Oddie	Townsend
Capper	Kenyon	Overman	Trammell
Caraway	Keyes	Phipps	Wadsworth
Cummins	King	Pittman	Walsh, Mass.
Curtis	Ladd	Poindexter	Warren
Fernald	La Follette	Pomerene	Watson, Ga.
France	Lenroot	Ransdell	Watson, Ind.
Gerry	McCumber	Sheppard	Willis
Gooding	McKellar	Shortridge

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-five Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR].

Mr. McKELLAR. On the motion to lay on the table I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I desire to offer, on page 38, line 19.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The committee amendment at that place has been stricken out of the bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, there has been a new section added, then. There is certainly an amendment in the bill in regard to interest upon indebtedness incurred for the purpose of purchasing Government securities.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the section inserted in the bill on that subject.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The Senate struck out the proviso beginning on line 13, page 38, and down to the end of line 19, and inserted the following words:

In the case of returns made for the taxable year 1921 or 1922 there shall be allowed as a deduction, in addition to the above, of so much of the interest paid or accrued during such taxable year, and before January 1, 1922, on indebtedness incurred or continued to purchase or carry obligations of the United States issued after September 24, 1917, the interest upon which is so wholly exempt, as is in excess of the interest received or accrued therefrom during the same period.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I propose my amendment as a proviso following immediately after the paragraph just read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. After the word "period," insert a colon and the following words:

Provided, That no deduction shall be allowed of interest on such indebtedness so incurred or continued for the purchase of or to carry obligations of the United States where the taxpayer did not pay par or more than par for the said obligations of the United States.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state his point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. I make the point of order that it is a proviso to an amendment already adopted as in Committee of the Whole, that it relates wholly to that amendment, and will not be in order unless the vote by which the committee amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There was so much confusion that I could not understand the statement of the point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is that this is a proviso to an amendment already adopted, and is not in order unless the vote by which the amendment was adopted is reconsidered. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I make a further point of order that the same amendment, in exactly the same words, has been voted upon before, and was voted down.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I submit that the amendment which was voted upon is not precisely the same amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida has made a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and that is the question now before the Senate. The question is on a reconsideration of the vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have no desire to interfere with reasonable dispatch in the consideration of this bill; I would like very much to have it disposed of as quickly as possible; and for that reason I was on hand to-night to answer to a roll call when it took practically an hour to get a quorum of the Senate present. I have been here on every occasion when we have held night sessions to answer the roll calls. So it is easy to see that I am in favor of expediting and dispatching the consideration of the bill as much as possible.

The amendment offered by me is intended for the purpose of restricting this deduction to patriotic citizens who borrowed money for the purpose of purchasing Government securities during the war, and it is intended for the purpose of barring bond speculators and bond brokers who have purchased bonds at less than par. I submit that the Government owes no beneficence to the bond sharks of the country, who have tried to keep down the price of Government securities, who have purchased them for the purpose of speculating in them, and for the purpose of making at least a reasonable interest upon their investment. Yet if we do not reconsider the vote by which the other amendment was adopted and do not agree to this amendment that will be the exact result of the provision as it now stands in the bill.

As it is at present it is discriminatory in its provisions against the patriotic citizen who borrowed money for the purpose of purchasing bonds at par during the war, because he receives only the interest specified upon the face of the bond. That is the limit of his income from his investment with borrowed capital. On the other hand, the speculator, the bond broker, who has incurred an indebtedness for the purpose of purchasing bonds at the ridiculously low price of these Federal securities at the present time, ranging from about 83 or 84, to a little more than that, considering the discount at which he purchased those bonds, will enjoy an income of probably 5 or 6 per cent on his investment. Yet you give him identically the same consideration which you extend to the citizen who so loyally supported his Government during the war that he went out and incurred an indebtedness for the purpose of purchasing bonds at par.

I offer the amendment in entire good faith, believe that it is only just and equitable, and that it extends a consideration which should be extended to those who have purchased Government securities with borrowed money. I hope the amendment heretofore adopted will be reconsidered.

Mr. SIMMONS. Will not the Senator restate what the amendment provides?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It provides, in substance, that the deduction which is allowed on account of interest on indebtedness incurred for the purchase of Government securities shall be a deduction only in favor of and to a taxpayer who purchased those securities at par. In other words, the purpose and object of it is to deny the privilege and benefit of that deduction to speculators who have purchased the bonds at discounts of 15, 16, or 17 per cent, in a great many instances. It would not only apply to those who have already made purchases of Government securities at these ridiculously low prices, but it would apply to those who may do so in the future.

The provisions of this amendment are not only restricted to investments which have previously been made, but the amendment applies to the future as well as to the past. The Government would say to the bond speculators, to those who up to the present time have very largely been responsible for holding down the price of Government securities, that the Government will not allow them, as a deduction against their taxes in the future, any interest they may pay on account of money they borrowed for the purpose of making these investments.

When the subject first came before the Senate, some three or four weeks ago, some one suggested that we should not extend this privilege to other than the citizen who purchased bonds during the war and had done so as a patriotic duty, for the purpose of assisting the Government in the successful prosecution of the war, and, as I recall, the Senator from Utah said:

While that seems to be the purpose and the object of this provision of the bill, how are you to accomplish it, how are you to segregate these investments so as to determine where you should allow it and where you should not?

The amendment proposed by me would accomplish that result, because the original purchasers from the Government in every instance paid par, and the purchasers other than the original purchasers have not paid par. I hope the Senate will reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to, and then take a vote on this amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. TRAMMELL. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harreld	McKinley	Shortridge
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Simmons
Broussard	Hitchcock	Moses	Spencer
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Stanley
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Sutherland
Cameron	Kendrick	Norbeck	Swanson

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. If there are no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 231, after line 21, insert the following new section:

SEC. 1006. That there shall be levied, collected, and paid by every person who contributes, loans, advances, or promises more than $100 in connection with any general, special, primary, or any election at which presidential or vice presidential electors, a Representative in Congress, or a Senator of the United States is to be voted for, or who contributes, loans, advances, or promises more than $100 to any person, committee, association, or organization which influences or attempts to influence the result of any such election, a tax equal to ten times the amount so contributed, loaned, advanced, or promised in excess of $100.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I wish to take just a moment of the time of the Senate to discuss the matter. Every Member of the Senate knows of the campaign contributions in national elections for a number of years past. It has not been confined to any party; it has not been confined to any State or to any faction in the State. The Senate four years ago passed an amendment similar to this. The country needs the taxes, and we will either stop the contributions which have been a disgrace to the country or we will get a considerable revenue under the provisions of the amendment.

On the amendment I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York offers an amendment, which the Secretary will report.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 31, after line 4, insert the following:

(c) For the purpose of the tax imposed by this section the taxpayer shall for the calendar year 1922 and each calendar year thereafter be allowed a credit equal to 20 per cent of the net income from a trade, business, or profession carried on by him, or from salaries, commissions, fees, or other compensation for his personal services. Such net income shall be separately computed for the purpose of this section under regulations prescribed by the commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I discussed at some length the situation which gives rise to the introduction of this amendment and I do not intend to ask the Senate to listen to me any longer upon it. It merely is an effort, commencing with the taxable year of 1922, and therefore not affecting the revenues to be collected from the taxable year 1921, to equalize to some extent at least the absurd discrepancy or discrimination which now exists between the taxation imposed upon professional men as individuals and partnerships in various lines of business on the one hand, and corporations doing exactly the same kind of business with the same amount of income on the other hand. I have discussed it at some length and do not intend to do so any further.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York is directed to a very important situation. In a speech which he made a few hours ago he called attention in a most impressive manner to the gross injustice of the bill. He called attention to the very gross disparity of the tax provisions of the bill as they bear upon individuals and partnerships on the one hand and corporations on the other hand. He gave some very clear illustrations of this disparity.

Following his remarks I also discussed the matter for a short time. Unfortunately during the discussion of the Senator from New York and others in which I participated there were very few Senators present. They were very properly in the restaurant trying to get something to eat at a reasonable hour.

I can not believe that Senators realize just the effect that the bill is going to have on the business interests of the country. I am sure that it is the desire of every Senator to make the burdens of taxation bear as equally upon the business of the country as can be done. The tax burdens are going to be heavy; they are now heavy, but the people of the country are willing to bear them if they are equally distributed, if the burden bears equally upon those who enjoy the same degree of prosperity and upon those who have the same income as measured by amount.

But the pending bill does not do that. The Senator from New York this afternoon predicted, and I think presented substantial arguments to substantiate his prediction, that if the bill passes the Senate as it is now framed and becomes a law, you are going to throw into confusion the business organizations of the country; you are going to have hundreds and thousands of people who are now doing business as individuals or partnerships who will form corporations. You are going to drive the individual and partnerships of the country into another form, into a corporate form.

The people of the country have often inveighed against the corporations. Personally I have never indulged in that. I have no criticism to make of an incorporation because it is such, but the people of the country are not all willing to engage in business in a corporate form. They do not desire to be driven into corporation form. For many reasons they prefer to act as individuals. For many reasons they prefer to act as partnerships rather than to adopt a corporate form of carrying on their business. On the other hand, there are many corporations in the country who do not desire to disincorporate.

But if by your tax bill you bring about such a discrimination as that people doing business in one form will be taxed much greater because of the form in which they are doing the business, they are going to adopt the other form, and necessarily so. Whenever it appears that if an individual by doing business as such is going to have to pay much higher taxes than he would pay if he were to change the form of his business and incorporate his business and do business as a corporation, you are going to drive him to that method. I wonder if Senators desire to do that sort of thing? Do they desire to force the individuals and partnerships of the country to organize as corporations?

On the other hand, as I said, if there are some corporations which would find it to their advantage to disincorporate by reason of the Federal taxes, if they find that they would save large taxes by disincorporating, they will be forced to do it, and they will do it. The disparity of the bill in that respect is so great that I insist that in three months after the bill is passed we will find thousands and hundreds of thousands of individuals and partnerships organizing corporations, not for the purpose of escaping taxation, but for the purpose of equalizing taxation. For example, here is one firm that is engaged in business as a partnership doing business alongside of a corporation engaged in the same line of business. The members of the partnership find that the corporation is paying less Federal taxes than the copartnership. They will be driven to organize a corporation. That is just what the bill is going to cause scores of businesses of the country to do.

Let me explain just how it is brought about. We propose to levy a flat tax of 15 per cent on the net income of corporations. The individual doing business must pay surtaxes on all of his income. He pays the normal tax of 8 per cent, and when his income gets to the point of $20,000 a year his surtaxes then are equivalent to 7 per cent more. That makes 15 per cent upon his income. So when he reaches the point where his income is $20,000 a year or more, he is forced to the organization of a corporation in order to equalize his taxes with the amount they would be if he were doing business in corporate form. That is what this bill means with the flat tax of 15 per cent upon corporations on the one hand and the high surtaxes upon individuals and partnership business on the other.

Moreover, corporations pay their flat 15 per cent and they keep in their business as much of their net income as they desire after paying that 15 per cent. It is estimated—and, by the way, it is only an estimate—that the corporations, on the average, retain in their business 30 per cent of their net income.

On that 30 per cent of their net income which they retain they do not pay any surtaxes; but the individual who is engaged in business, the partnership which is engaged in business, accounts for every dollar of income retained in the business; in other words, when the corporations of the country reinvest or retain in their treasury a portion of their income which is undistributed, and which, as I have said, it is estimated, on the average, is about 30 per cent, they pay no surtax upon that, but individuals and partners do.

The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] provides that individuals and partners may retain in their business 30 per cent of the net income derived for their trade or business. I do not believe that is the proper way to reach this problem; but it does emphasize the very great disparity which exists between these different forms of business. If there were no other plan, if there were no better plan, then I submit the amendment of the Senator from New York would be a step in the right direction. It may, perhaps, go a little too far, but his amendment does call attention to the very gross disparity under this bill as between different forms of business.

Much has been said here about not putting a tax upon the undistributed income of corporations. The only reason why such a proposition has been made is because of the great disparity to which attention has been called. Such a tax was proposed and will be proposed again for the purpose of remedying the situation to a certain degree.

Much has been said here about the money of those who have the very high incomes being driven into tax-exempt securities. Once before I have stated here that a very small part of those incomes goes into tax-exempt securities compared to the amount of them which goes into unproductive securities. I mean by that securities which are not paying any dividends.

I have here the New York Tribune. Here [exhibiting] is a whole page containing in double columns a list of the stocks which are dealt in actively on the New York Stock Exchange. There are given the dividends which are being paid by different concerns, and those which are not paying any dividends are also put down here.

Senators would probably be astonished if they have not been following the quotations of the New York Stock Exchange to find how many of these concerns are not paying dividends at all, and yet the stock of some of them is selling in the market for good prices, in some cases for as much as three-fourths of the par value of the stock, though they are not paying any dividends. The stock of others is selling at lesser prices. However, they are all concerns which it is hoped will pay dividends at some time in the future. Using the language which the majority report of the Finance Committee uses, they are concerns which yield no dividends at present but which promise well for the future. There is where the money is going. It is going there for what reason? Because these corporations do not distribute their income in dividends.

They are keeping it in their treasuries for the purpose of putting substance into their overstocked corporations. They put it into their treasuries; they do not pay any dividends now; many of them probably will not pay any dividends for some years to come; but people are buying such stock to-day. Who is buying such stock? The men who enjoy high individual incomes who want to escape taxation. The money is going there, and whenever we offer an inducement for the corporation to retain in its treasury or in its business its income we are offering an inducement for the augmentation of that kind of business, that kind of investment; we are deliberately inducing people with large incomes, which ought to be paying high surtaxes, to invest their money into securities of that sort for the purpose of evading taxation.

I should like to call attention to this page. Comparatively speaking, I doubt if one-fourth of the stocks quoted on the page pay any dividends at all. If Senators will just glance over that sheet it will tell the story; it will tell where the large incomes are going. They are going into nondividend-paying stocks—stocks, however, which promise well for the future, provided there is levied a low rate of taxation on the corporate income and corporations are permitted to retain their incomes in their treasuries. We are offering this inducement; and how do Senators expect to keep up the high surtaxes with the Federal taxation laws offering inducements for that kind of an investment?

Talk to me about investment in tax-exempt securities; such investment is comparatively insignificant compared with this great reservoir which is absorbing the vast incomes of the country on which high surtaxes would be paid if they were invested in productive enterprises or dividend-paying enterprises. That is what is being done, and, in addition to that, by this legislation we are not only inducing that sort of a situation but we are doing a great injustice as between various classes of business. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York seeks to equalize that by exempting from the surtaxes a percentage of the net income of individuals and partnerships engaged in business.

I have prepared another plan to meet this situation. The people of this country are willing to bear this burden if it is to be borne equally. I know the great American people are willing to make sacrifices for their country; but when one man finds that he is being taxed in one way while his neighbor is being taxed in another way, we are inviting a rebellion against these laws. The people will not tolerate that sort of thing, and they ought not to tolerate it, but they ought to condemn any Congress which would impose the burden of taxation in any such way.

If there is no disparity, it will not do any harm to permit the individual or partnership to make returns as a corporation; it will do no harm for the corporation to be permitted under the law to make its return as a partnership. If we want equality, let people engaged in business select the form of return and not force a partnership to incorporate or individuals to incorporate for the mere purpose of equalizing taxes along with their neighbor who is doing business as a corporation. Why force them to use another form for doing their business? Why force those corporations to disincorporate which are doing business on such a basis that they would pay higher surtaxes as corporations than individuals or partnerships would pay? Why not permit them to make returns as partnerships?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to make a request for unanimous consent, and I ask the Senator if he will yield for that purpose?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate closes its session this evening it recess until to-morrow at 10 o'clock.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, will the Senator give us some idea as to when we are going to recess? Is it proposed to keep us here all night?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can not say exactly at what time the recess will be taken.

Mr. McKELLAR. Unless we could have some kind of an idea as to when we are going to recess I shall object.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; I am ready to go on if the Senator wishes to do so, and to go on all night, so far as that is concerned.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; I am very anxious to have a recess, and I think we ought to take a recess in the next half hour or so. I do not think we ought to stay here all day and night, too.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I can assure the Senator that there is no desire or inclination on this side of the House to have a recess.

Mr. McKELLAR. Very well.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish, then, to address a question to the Senator from New Mexico, if I may have the attention of the Senator.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am listening to the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. On this point I want the attention of the Senate, if I may have it, Mr. President, because the proposition that is involved in this amendment is a most important one. I want to ask the Senator if he is in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am not, Mr. President.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought not; and I wanted to call the Senator's attention to just what it means. I thought there was in course of preparation a provision that would allow those partnerships or individuals who had an invested capital, and whose earnings were dependent rather upon their capital than upon the efforts of any one of the partners or individuals, to retain a certain amount of the earnings which would be necessary to carry on their business; in other words, if a man had $500,000 invested in business, his capital, and he made $20,000, that he might have 20 per cent of that, or $4,000, retained in his business to meet the exigencies of the next year without having to pay a tax on it. But here, even after reducing the matter from 30 to 20 per cent, you release every income in the United States, and you release the higher brackets. In other words, you cut out 20 per cent of all of the earnings of practically all of the people in the United States, and a man who had an earning of a million dollars would have but $800,000 that he would have to pay a tax upon; and the result would be, in my opinion, with this amendment, that you would deprive the Government of at least $200,000,000.

It may be that in some way we can at some time, at least, arrive at a different method of taxation, where we shall recognize no distinction between an individual in business and a corporation in business; but we have followed for years and years the rule of imposing special taxes upon corporations, and considering them in a little different light from individuals; and whatever might possibly be worked out as an entirely new system of taxation, the result of this amendment—and that is the real thing before the Senate—would be an enormous reduction in the revenues of the Government.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Mexico permit me to ask a question of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I gladly yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My question does not relate to the merits or lack of merits of this rather roughly-drawn amendment. This is the question:

The House having passed the bill carrying a 32 per cent maximum surtax on incomes, and the Senate being about to pass the bill with a 50 per cent maximum surtax rate on incomes, is it within the power of the conferees, in adjusting their differences on the surtaxes, to take into consideration and treat in any manner this subject which the Senator from New Mexico and I have been discussing this evening?

I shall be perfectly frank in what I am about to say. I hope it is possible for the conferees at least to take this matter into consideration in perfecting the bill. I am not boasting about the perfection of my amendment. I understand very well its grave defects, especially as it affects the revenue from 1922 on.

It will have no effect on the revenue collected from 1921; but the situation is so serious, and is, to my mind, so important from the standpoint of a broad public policy, that I am wondering if it is possible to get this Congress, either here in the Senate or in the conference committee, to give it some consideration and perhaps work out some partial relief.

I do not boast of being an expert in my knowledge of this situation, but I see partnerships—at least, in my mind's eye I do—all over this country tumbling, tumbling, tumbling into corporate form, and I have grave doubt whether that is a good thing for the industry and the economic life of the Republic.

My question was somewhat prolonged. Does the Senator think that without any amendment the matter can be discussed in the conference?

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, if we had but the single question before the conference committee as between a surtax of 32 per cent and a surtax of 50 per cent or 40 per cent, I should say that we could only compromise as between those two; but we have made so very, very many amendments to the House bill, and almost written a new bill, that I have not the slightest doubt but that there are other provisions in the bill by which considerable latitude would be allowed the conferees in working out some new scheme, at least to some extent; but I can not, offhand, assure that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask another question of the Senator from North Dakota? My amendment as drawn affects all incomes of individuals and partnerships. The vice of the present situation becomes apparent after the income of a partnership passes the $20,000-a-year mark.

Mind you, the partnership may consist of three or four individuals. Twenty per cent divided amongst the three or four would not give any of them what we call a high income in these days; but the vice becomes apparent after the income of the partnership passes the $20,000 mark, because then it begins to fall under the staggering blow of the surtax, bracket after bracket, to which the corporation which is its competitor is not subject. Would the Senator from North Dakota allow this matter to go to conference if I inserted this language on the second line of the amendment: Change the word "the," in front of "taxpayer," to "any" and insert after the word "taxpayer" the words "whose net income is in excess of $20,000"?

Mr. McCUMBER. That might, as the Senator says, reach what he considers the vice in the proposed legislation; but it carries within it a vice which is to my mind very much greater, in that it affects all of the higher incomes and deducts its 20 per cent, or whatever it may be, from those excessively high incomes upon which you have placed the higher brackets, and means an enormous loss in revenue to the Government, as well as, many of us think, more or less of an injustice in relieving those having the higher incomes from a greater proportion of the tax. I hope that we may find some way in which the conferees may take up the matter which the Senator has in mind, but I am extremely fearful of cutting off a flat 20 per cent on all these enormous incomes, even for the purpose of bringing the matter into conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago—again with the courtesy of the Senator from New Mexico—I recognize the defects here; but I say in all sincerity, Senators, that within two or three years the Congress of the United States will have to face this situation. Otherwise, the industrial and economic life of this country is going to be transformed—inevitably so, irresistibly so—in a direction which is unhealthy. We are not imposing taxes justly or equally as between business concerns of one type and another engaged in the same kind of business. The Senate may reject this thing; the conferees may fail to get any solution of it; but sooner or later it is going to become one of the most pressing questions in this country, and it must be solved.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I am very glad to have heard the remarks which the Senator from New York has just made. The objection which the Senator from North Dakota makes is that there will be a large reduction of revenue under the plan proposed by the Senator from New York. I think he is right about that; to what extent, however, no one can say; but if we can manage somehow to equalize this situation without any loss of revenue or any material loss of revenue, why should we not do it?

I want to call attention to this fact: The Senator from New York has emphasized the thought by saying that you are going to have a widespread transformation of the businesses of this country if the revenue legislation shall be such as that embodied in the bill now before the Senate. He is right about it; and if that transformation comes, as it will come—as it will come in the next few months if this bill is to pass as it is now framed—if you are going to have that transformation in business, it will come about for what reason?

For the purpose of equalizing taxes, because there will be a change in taxation by means of this transformation. If you can prevent the transformation which would go on, and which we ought not to have—I am sure nobody wants to drive the business interests of this country to change the form under which they are doing business—if we can find a means for equalizing that taxation which will not result in that transformation of the business of the country, why should we not do it?

To call attention to the situation, I want to refer to this table on page 11 of the minority report of the Finance Committee. Nobody questions the accuracy of the table. It has been discussed here before in other connections, and nobody questions the accuracy or the force of it.

We find this amazing situation under this bill as it now stands, that if there is a business which has a net income of $500,000 a year, conducted by an individual, he will pay a tax upon that income equal to 37.69 per cent. If that same individual organizes the business into a corporation, and does not pay out of the business any dividends, if he retains the net income in the business, he will pay 14.94 per cent. That is the difference. An individual doing business and earning a half million dollars of income during the year will pay 37.69 per cent of that in taxes; but if he incorporates that business, he will have to pay only 14.94 per cent.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator has omitted, has he not, the further factor, as I denominated it a few moments ago, namely, the dividends which would be distributed by that corporation and the tax which would be paid by the receiver of the dividends to the Government?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, a man engaged in business who has an income of $500,000 a year undoubtedly would pay high surtaxes upon any dividends, and the result would be that he would not distribute any dividends, on which he would have to pay an income tax reaching up to 50 per cent.

Let us consider a personal-service corporation, where there is no invested capital allowed, which all belongs to a few individuals, or perhaps a man and his wife would incorporate the business. They would keep the money in the business. They would not pay any dividends; and that is just the practice these concerns are following to-day.

Mr. KING. That might be reached by a tax on undivided profits or undistributed dividends.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is another remedy which I have proposed; but it is not reached at all in this bill, and this would offer inducements for these people as individuals to incorporate their business, as under this bill they would have to pay only 15 per cent tax upon their net incomes, but if they were doing business as individuals they would pay taxes as high as 58 per cent. So the inducement would be to drive an individual into the corporate form of doing business; that is what would result.

I have already presented to the committee considering this question an amendment proposing that there be a graduated tax upon undistributed incomes of such corporations. I realize that that did not put the corporation and the partnership and the individual on an absolute parity, but it was a step in the right direction.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Does the Senator think this proposed amendment would achieve the result which he desires to arrive at?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Wherefore the Senator opposes the amendment now pending?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am opposing that amendment; but that amendment recognizes the force of the situation as I am trying to present it.

Now, just another illustration: If this business concern, as an individual, is earning $1,000,000 a year, the individual will pay 38.85 per cent tax upon that income, but if he incorporates his business he will pay only 15 per cent tax.

What will be the inevitable result?

In my remarks to the Senate the other day I presented a little table which was furnished me, giving this result, this being upon averages, that on an income of $32,000 an individual will be taxed 14.5 per cent and the corporation tax would be $4,800, or $200 in favor of the individual; but if they earn $66,000, the individual would pay a tax of $15,000, or 23 per cent, while the corporation would pay only $9,900, a difference in favor of the corporation of $5,100. If the net income is $100,000, the individual would pay a tax of $29,000, or 29 per cent, while the corporation would pay only $15,000, a reduction of $13,800.

If the business had a net income of $300,000, the individual would pay a tax of $109,000, or 38 per cent, while the corporation, with the same income, would pay only $45,000, a difference in favor of the corporation of $64,000.

If the income were $1,000,000, the individual would pay a tax of $389,000, or at the rate of 38.9 per cent. The corporation would pay only $150,000, a difference in favor of the corporation of $239,000.

Do you tell me that under those circumstances you are not going to drive businesses into incorporating? It will come about just as inevitably as that the sun will rise on to-morrow's morn.

Then there is another class of injustices. If there is a partnership, and there are two partners, and the income of the partnership is only $50,000 a year, the individual would pay 18.38 per cent, the partnership would pay 11.52 per cent; the corporation would pay 14.20 per cent, allowing for the exemption of the $2,000. If there are four partners, they would pay only 7.16 per cent. So, in such a case as that there would be a discrimination against those corporations which are earning small dividends, and which have a small number of stockholders. The effect would be to cause the disincorporation of such corporations as those.

The people of this country have organized their businesses according to their views of the best interests of the businesses, their individual best interests, and the best interests of the country. We do not want to force this great transformation.

The situation can be met, in my judgment, and the Government would not lose much, if any, revenue, because, as I said, if the bill is passed as it is framed, the Government will be forcing partnerships and individuals to incorporate and will inevitably lose revenue. It will force some corporations to disincorporate and will lose that revenue anyhow. There would be a loss of revenue if the bill as it is written were passed, and if we can bring about an equality without producing any greater loss, why not let business suffer simply the same loss and avoid this great inequality? That can be done, and it can be done in this way, by permitting the partners to make their returns as corporations and permitting the stockholders of the corporation to make a return as a partnership.

Let them elect the form in which they will make the return. They will elect that form which they would necessarily be driven into if this bill is passed as it is framed. If it is to their interest to be a partnership, they will become a partnership. If it is to their interest to be a corporation, they will make their returns as a corporation, and make their returns that way without having to reorganize and transform their businesses. Can any argument be made against that proposition?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, am I to understand, then, that the Senator would have the law so framed as to make it optional with the partnership or the corporation to make the one or the other return?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. That is precisely what I propose, and this afternoon I offered an amendment for that very purpose. The amendment is in the hands of the printer, and I have been expecting it every moment.

I want to call attention to one very significant provision in this bill. Under the present law we permit personal service corporations to make returns as partnerships. I just wonder how many have thought of the significance of that thing? Under the present law we permit personal service corporations to make returns as partnerships. Under this bill that is limited to the first of next January. I asked one of the experts why that limitation. He said, "Because after the 1st of January there will be no inducement to make a return as a partnership, as they would pay less as a corporation than they would as a partnership." That is in the law. There can be no question about it. It has been in operation for three years as to personal service corporations. They have been permitted to make returns as partnerships, because their invested capital was small, and to subject them to the excess-profits taxes would not be right. The excess-profits taxes being based upon invested capital, and such concerns having small invested capital, to subject them to the excess-profits tax would make them bear an extraordinarily heavy burden, and I think very properly the Congress provided in the existing revenue law that such corporations, during the time we had the excess-profits tax, should make returns as partnerships.

If that thing is advisable as to those personal-service corporations in order to equalize their taxes, then, I ask, what reason can be given for preventing a partnership from making a return as a corporation, when by so doing it will merely equalize its taxation along with that of its neighbor who is doing business as a corporation?

I wish some one would rise in his place and answer. If any answer can be made to that, I beg of Congress to let the people of this country understand it. If you are going to make that discrimination as between the citizens of this country who are doing business as individuals and partnerships, and favor those who are doing business as corporations, I say to you that you owe it to the people of this country to give some reason for it.

I presented this situation to one of the experts of the Treasury Department, and I asked him why such a provision was not put into this bill. He said because they had concluded it would be better to let the individuals and the partnerships organize as corporations. I do not believe that is best. I do not believe the heavy hand of taxation of this Government should be placed upon the back of any citizen and force him to do business in a form in which he does not want to do it. But that is what you are doing, and nobody rises here to give a word of explanation. Yet you are going on and discriminating in this gross manner against the business people of the country.

As I said in the beginning, they are willing to bear the burdens of the Government if you will equalize the burdens; but you do not propose to do that.

Mr. President, I have been anxious to have the bill considered and have it passed so that we may proceed with the transaction of other business. I have been expecting every moment the printed copy of the amendment which I propose to offer. That amendment proposes to give to individuals and partners the right to elect the form in which they will make their return. It is prepared with a great deal of care. In my judgment it meets the situation and is gotten up in practical form. It provides for every contingency, I believe, which can be suggested in opposition to it. It is not here just now, however. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate further at this hour in discussing the bill, but I do desire to propose the amendment as a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

I am informed that the printed amendment has just this moment reached us, and I will ask the Secretary to read it. I offer that as a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed substitute.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from New York the Senator from New Mexico offers the following:

On page 60, after line 13, insert two new paragraphs as follows:

"(e) An individual or partnership engaged in any trade or business may at any time after January 1, 1922, file with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue a statement declaring an election to be, for all the purposes of this title, an association with respect to such trade or business, and thereafter, for the taxable year in which such election is made and for succeeding taxable years, such association shall be taxable with respect to such trade or business as a corporation under part 3 of this title, and also subject to all other provisions of this title relative to corporations. Any distribution of profits made by such association to the individual or individuals comprising it shall constitute dividends under this title, and shall be included in gross income of the distributee as of the date when the cash or other property is unqualifiedly separated from the other property of such association as the property or to the credit of the distributee outside of such trade or business.

"(f) An election once made under subdivision (e) of this section shall not be subject to change by such association or by the individual or individuals comprising it, and shall be binding upon such individual or individuals and upon their personal representatives with respect to such trade or business, and upon any other individual or individuals entering into any new partnership with such electing individual or individuals or with their personal representatives with respect to such trade or business, unless and until the commissioner advises such association in writing that owing to changes in the ownership or nature of such trade or business, or in the provisions of this title affecting the same, it is necessary or just that it be relieved from such election."

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I do not wish by this procedure to disparage at all the amendment offered by the Senator from New York. I believe I shall not offer it as a substitute for his amendment, but permit his amendment to be voted upon separately, and after that vote I shall determine whether or not to call up my amendment. I know that the Senator from New York has offered his amendment in perfect good faith and I do not wish to deprive him of a direct vote upon his proposed amendment. Therefore I shall not offer mine just at this moment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, the hour is late and the amendment which I propose to offer has just been printed, and Senators have not had an opportunity to examine it. Therefore I shall not call it up for consideration at this time. I ask that it may lie on the table for consideration at a future time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The principal legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McNary	Stanfield
Brandegee	Harreld	Moses	Stanley
Broussard	Harris	New	Sutherland
Bursum	Jones, N. Mex.	Newberry	Swanson
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nicholson	Townsend

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On pages 48 and 49 strike out all of subdivision (c) and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(c) That where 75 per cent or more of the income of the taxpayer is received from the labor or personal service of the taxpayer, in the case of a single person, the amount of the personal exemption shall be $1,500; or in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife, the amount of the personal exemption shall be $3,000 unless the net income in the case of a single person is more than $3,500, in which case the personal exemption shall be $1,000, or unless the net income in the case of the head of the family or a married person living with husband or wife is more than $6,000, in which case the personal exemption shall be $2,000. That where 25 per cent or more of the income of the taxpayer is derived from sources other than from his or her personal labor or services, in case of a single person the amount of the personal exemption shall be $1,000; or in the case of the head of the family or a married person living with husband or wife, the amount of the personal exemption shall be $2,500, unless the net income is in excess of $5,000, in which case the personal exemption shall be $2,000. A husband and wife living together shall receive but one personal exemption; such exemption shall be the amount heretofore set forth. If such husband and wife make separate returns, the personal exemption may be taken by either or divided between them. That the personal exemption herein provided shall not apply in the case of a single person whose net income is $8,000 or more, nor shall the said personal exemption apply in the case of the head of a family or a married person living with husband or wife where the aggregate net income of such husband and wife is $15,000 or more.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, there seems to be a disposition on the part of certain Senators to railroad everything through to-night without giving any consideration whatever to the merits of amendments which are being proposed. The Republican majority wanted to adjourn early to-night, some of them, it is said, desiring to fill dinner engagements, and because they are detained here at work it appears that they are determined not to give a fair consideration to amendments presented. After having consumed weeks in debate and weeks of labor in an effort to get the bill in its present shape, which even a prominent Republican Senator here has stated to-night imposed practically twice the amount of taxes upon the individual or partnership that it does upon a corporation, it is said we must not attempt further to correct indefensible provisions of the bill. I suppose, Mr. President, a majority of those who are piloting this measure are afraid that if it has a little more consideration we shall come nearer distributing the tax burdens as between the big corporate interests and the wealth of the country and the individuals and those who are engaged in trade and business in partnerships.

The Committee on Finance came in here with a "little" bill of particulars providing for reductions from the present law to the corporations and wealth amounting to the small sum of $615,000,000. Many of our Republican Senators did not think they had to rush the bill through at that time; they did not think it proper to refuse ample consideration to the merits of the original plan to eliminate $615,000,000 for the benefit of the swollen fortunes of the land, but instead they struggled here for two or three weeks in an effort to have the profiteers of this country exempted of $450,000,000 of taxes. They labored very arduously here for weeks trying to have the surtaxes cut down so that they would save $90,000,000 to the individuals who were receiving net incomes of $68,000 per annum. They did not consider that a waste of time.

Republican Senators also spent considerable time seeking to have a reduction of $75,000,000 made in the corporation capital-stock tax. They seemed to think that was all right; it was not a waste of time for Senators to stay here and occupy days in their struggle to relieve the big interests and wealth of the country $615,000,000 in taxes and shift the burden to those less able to pay, but when a Senator offers an amendment to try to alleviate to some extent the burdens which are imposed upon the struggling American citizen who is making scarcely enough to live upon and to support his family, then all at once those same Senators get in a great speed-up move and they want to railroad things, giving no consideration to the merits of the proposition.

I have offered an amendment here proposing that where 75 per cent or more of the earnings of an individual is the result of his personal labor and his personal services there shall be exempted to him free of taxation if he is a married man or the head of a family, $3,000; in the case of a single person, under similar circumstances, that there shall be an exemption of $1,500. My position is that where the income is the result of the personal labor and personal services of a citizen, or at least where 75 per cent of it is so, that we should certainly not begin taxing the fruits of his labor and his industry until we shall have exempted a sufficient amount upon which he may support himself and his family in proper comfort and to afford reasonable educational opportunities to his children. Yet some of those who would have the small sum of $615,000,000 of taxes removed from those who engage in profiteering, from those who are receiving incomes of more than $68,000 per annum, and from those who have contributed to the capital-stock tax in a total sum of $75,000,000, those who plead the cause of that class representing the enormous wealth of this country and vast incomes say, "We can not make the reduction because we need the revenue."

Why was not that answer hurled back when the profiteers of this country appealed to those directing this legislation to repeal the excess-profits tax? Why did those Senators not hurl back that answer to those who, receiving a net income of $68,000 and more per annum, pleaded with them to exempt in the aggregate $90,000,000 per annum from taxation? Why did not those Senators here a few days ago, when the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] introduced an amendment providing that holding corporations should be exempt in an aggregate sum of $20,000,000 taxes, shout back the answer, "We can not do it, because we have to raise revenue"?

Do you wonder, Senators, that the great mass of the American people of but little and moderate means and incomes since this tax bill has been under consideration have formed the opinion that it is one that is in the interest of the large corporations of the country and of the big business and wealth of the Nation; that you have been spending more time for the purpose of shifting the burden of those who are best able to pay their taxes and contribute to the support of the Government than you have in making an effort to see that justice and fairness and equitable dealing be extended to the poor, to those of moderate means and the small business of the Nation, who are not able to bear heavy taxation?

Mr. President, I do not object to a night session; I am glad to remain here; we should work night and day to finish this bill; and I wish to thank Senators who were trying to plan to have a little vacation this evening for waiving their wishes along that line and remaining here, that we may proceed with the public's work.

If the Republican committee, upon whom it devolved to have written a tax bill, had gotten busy 8 or 10 months ago, if the majority party in the Senate had been busy months ago, instead of jogging along here and killing time and marking time and taking a vacation during the summer, we would have had the tax bill out of the way long since. No responsibility for any delay on this bill can be attributed to those who have dared to offer amendments and to those who have dared to call attention to the features of the bill which were, as they conceived them, obnoxious, which, as many of us have looked upon them, were inexcusable and indefensible. I would not think very much of a Senator on the other side if he sat idly by and saw something "put over" that he did not think was proper; and I do not think that his constituents back home would approve of any such cowardly conduct.

I realize that the Republican majority in control of the Senate are heartily in sympathy with the policy which this bill carries with it at present. It has been conspicuously apparent that a large majority of them were heartily in sympathy with the policy proposed by the measure when it was first brought into the Senate, and that they are somewhat disturbed, they are somewhat annoyed, because the Democrats made a fight to have certain provisions re-formed, and then that a minority upon the Republican side, following the courageous lead of the Democrats, with probably a whispered but nevertheless forceful threat that if the majority did not consent to some changes they were going to join with the Democrats and were going to amend this bill anyway, and therefore the majority had to amend it; no doubt they are still worrying about that. The Wall Street Journal's charge that the majority of the Republicans surrendered and made a cowardly retreat is doubtless still haunting them. As a result of the fight made by Democrats we have seen the Republicans falling down upon their job so far as getting the entire deduction of $615,000,000 which they sought to have deducted from the tax burden of the wealth of the country. They were not able to carry off quite as much as they hoped to carry off for the corporate and big interests which the Republican Party seems to be serving first and foremost. That is certainly true in regard to this tax bill.

When Senator McKellar to-night offered an amendment which meant some relief to the people who are being required to pay excessive passenger rates, a very plain, simple proposition, the Republican majority had no time to consider that; oh, no; they were afraid that, forsooth, a measure of that kind, if adopted, would promptly cut down the incomes of the corporate interests of the country, which they seem to be overzealous in trying to protect; but if that amendment had provided that the Government should guarantee certain earnings to the railroads, then I am sure that whether in order or out of order, pertinent or impertinent, relevant or irrelevant, it would by them have been very seriously and sympathetically considered.

I am not criticizing you. There is just a difference of opinion as to what the policy should be upon the part of the legislative body of the Nation in dealing with tax problems and other questions of great concern to the American people. I am sure that our Republican friends, whose tax bill this is—except as to some amendments forced by Democrats—are well pleased at the achievements of the weeks past; so well pleased that they do not care to consider anything else at this time.

I say, Mr. President, that there are yet in this bill inexcusable and indefensible provisions. What are the American people going to think when they begin to groan under the burden of the taxation imposed by this measure when it dawns upon them to their sorrow that the Congress of the United States has lessened the tax burden on those most able to pay and has increased and enlarged the tax burden of those least able to pay?

What are the American people going to think when it is brought to their attention, by the weight of the burden imposed upon them, that individuals and partners engaged in trade and business are required under an act of Congress to pay about twice as much tax as corporations? What do you believe the smaller corporations will think of you imposing heavier burdens upon them?

I know that our Republican friends heartily approve of such policy. If you did not you would not have made it so conspicuous in this measure. But I am just asking the question, What are the great masses of the taxpayers going to think of this bill, which shifts the burden from those able to pay to those unable to pay? I know what I would think of it as a common, ordinary, every-day American citizen. If I were engaged in a partnership business, and, as illustrated by the Senator from New York, my tax burden upon a volume of $50,000 of business was more than $5,000 greater than that of a corporation doing an equal amount of business, I would think—and I believe I would be justified in thinking—that the Congress of the United States could see nothing except the big, rich, the large corporations and dollars—dollars and corporations. I would know that was all a majority of the Senators could see, or else they would not inflict upon the American people any such piece of injustice and discriminatory taxation.

If the Senate had devoted more time to seeking to relieve the country from the excessive freight and passenger rates you might have done a better piece of work than you have in your labors to so rewrite our tax law as to discriminate in favor of the profiteer and big fortunes to the extent of $615,000,000. Congress enacted a law here providing certain benefits to the railroads—no benefits whatever to the public. I am thankful that I voted against the present law controlling railroads.

Effort after effort has been made to have certain provisions of that law repealed, the one in particular authorizing the fixing of rates that would produce earnings up to as much as 5½ per cent, and then an optional one-half per cent more. Some of us have thought that if we could repeal this provision and restore to the Interstate Commerce Commission the power it possessed prior to the enactment of the Esch-Cummins law, we would probably obtain some relief in the way of a readjustment of the freight rates, the passenger rates, and a reduction in a great many instances where they are absolutely unreasonable, exorbitant, and unbearable upon the traffic upon which they are imposed. More than six months ago I introduced in the Senate a bill to repeal this provision of the law and have done all in my power to have my measure passed. Certainly we could be no worse off if we had that provision of the law repealed. The whole country has been upon bended knees begging Congress, appealing to the Interstate Commerce Commission, to afford at least some measure of relief upon freight and passenger rates; the people of my State have pleaded and pleaded for relief; and yet we have found those in control of Congress not busying themselves, at least upon this subject. Those who have the power to afford relief manifest no sympathy and take no action. In the meantime the fruit grower and the farmers of my State and of other sections are being robbed of the fruits of their labor and a reasonable income upon their investment because of exorbitant transportation charges.

I mention the neglect in regard to dealing with this railroad freight-rate and passenger problem that we may see that our Republican friends in control of the Senate have not been actively engaged in trying to make corrections in this important matter for the relief of the American people. This tax measure is about the only bill of any consequence you have brought before the Senate, although the Republican administration has been in power eight months. You start out in this measure by providing, in the very beginning of the original bill, a reduction of about $615,000,000 of taxes to the ultrarich and the millionaire corporations of the country.

I do not know why such solicitude should be extended in their interest and why the deaf ear and the stony heart should be turned upon the poor people of the country, those of moderate means and incomes, who have no representatives here to fight their cause, except as now and then some one stands upon the floor of the Congress and tries to present their cause.

We are here for the purpose of legislating fairly and justly for the entire American people. I appreciate what a factor capital is in the progress and the development of our country. I believe that we should extend capital justice and be fair in imposing the tax burden upon wealth, but I do not share in this idea that all of the prosperity of the country comes from favoritism extended to the big business of the Nation. I know that our Republican friends believe such policy the solution for all ills. They are honest and sincere in such views. That is the reason why you are writing that kind of policy into this bill, but some of us entertain different views. We believe if we are to have prosperity, if our people are to be content and happy, justice must be vouchsafed to all, from the humblest to the highest. You do not seek to make any reduction whatever upon the burden of the man of moderate means or the man who is barely making sufficient to support himself and his family in this bill. You have removed the excess-profits tax, you have made large reductions upon the large and rich corporations, you have let the profiteers go scot free, and, upon the other hand, accepting the statements made by the Senator from New York [Mr. Wadsworth] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. Simmons], you have placed the tax burden upon the individual citizen and the partnership at double that placed upon the corporations of the country doing the same kind of business. That is what you have done; and yet some seem to think that a man is absolutely invading sacred rights, almost, to deign to offer some other amendment to the bill to try to perfect some objectionable feature.

Now, I say that. Why? Because every amendment that has been offered here to-night has been brushed aside with a refusal of a yea-and-nay vote. You took time here sufficient to give a thousand yea-and-nay votes upon the consideration of your amendments providing, for instance, for the elimination of the $450,000,000 of excess profits. You occupied ample time for a hundred yea-and-nay votes upon the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. Lodge] providing for a reduction of $20,000,000 of taxation to the holding companies of this country. You occupied sufficient time here in your pleas and your solicitude in your effort to obtain a reduction of $90,000,000 in taxation for the benefit of those receiving incomes of more than $68,000 net per annum to have hundreds of yea-and-nay votes. To take up so much time for this relief of the profiteers and big incomes I suppose you think was a patriotic service. That is all right. I am not surprised that we can not get a sufficient number of Senators here to call for a record vote upon some of these measures. You simply do not care to be on record. You prefer keeping the people back home in ignorance as to how you are voting upon many questions of vital concern to them.

Mr. President, I have presented this amendment, and I believe that where 75 per cent or more of a person's income is a result of his labor he should certainly be exempt from taxation on as much as $3,000 of that income; that is, where he is a married man or where he is the head of a family.

I think the policy, the purpose of the majority certainly must be not to begin imposing a tax on a person until his income is sufficient for him to support comfortably his wife, himself, and his children. The amendment has its limitation, in that it provides that exemption shall apply if a person's income is more than a certain sum, $6,000 per annum in the case of a married person, or $3,500 in the case of a single person. So you have your restriction there. In such cases a married man only gets $2,500 exemption and a single person $1,000 exemption.

In order to take care of the question of the loss of revenue it also provides that no exemption shall be made in the case of a single person receiving an income of over $8,000 per annum, or a married person or the head of a family receiving a net income of $15,000 or more per annum. That, in a measure, recoups for the loss of revenue due to the fact that you make a larger exemption to the person receiving a smaller income.

I very much hope that the amendment will be given serious consideration and will be agreed to. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida demands the yeas and nays on agreeing to his amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Assistant Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

So Mr. TRAMMELL's amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still open to amendment as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I reserve for a vote in the Senate the amendment found on page 115, subdivision (f).

Mr. REED addressed the Senate. After having spoken for some time—

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me at this juncture?

Mr. REED. I will yield if I do not have to yield the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not want the floor, but I want to propound an inquiry.

Mr. REED. I do not want to lose the floor.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has worked for months diligently and with a capacity which all of us admire. I want to propound the following interrogatory to the Senator, with a view of ascertaining if some agreement may not be reached as to a vote without setting a definite time for a vote. Would the Senator from Missouri, and other Senators, consider the following: That we recess now until 10 o'clock a. m. to-day; that we remain in session from 10 a. m. until 12 p. m., 14 hours; that during those 14 hours every Senator who secures recognition shall have one hour and such additional time as other Senators who obtain the floor may see fit to yield to him; that we recess at 12 o'clock midnight Saturday until 10 o'clock on Monday morning, and that on Monday at 10 o'clock we resume the consideration of the bill, every Senator thereafter to have 10 minutes on every amendment proposed and on the bill, but that no time shall be set for a vote.

Mr. REED. I am feeling very fresh to-night.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona submit that to the Senate as a request for unanimous consent?

Mr. ASHURST. No; I am only proposing it tentatively. I will restate it as follows:

That we recess until 10 o'clock to-day; that we remain in session 14 hours on Saturday, from 10 o'clock a. m. until 12 o'clock midnight; that each Senator who secures recognition shall have one hour and such additional time as he may have yielded to him by any other Senator who secures the floor; that we recess at 12 o'clock midnight Saturday and reconvene at 10 o'clock a. m. Monday morning, and that on Monday at 10 o'clock we resume the consideration of the bill, and every Senator thereafter shall have 10 minutes on every amendment proposed and on the bill, but no time shall be set for a vote.

Mr. REED resumed his speech. After having spoken for some time,

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me at this juncture, with the understanding that he does not yield the floor?

Mr. REED. I do not want to lose the floor. I would not lose the floor for anything.

Mr. ASHURST. I will join the Senator in that; and the Senator does not need any help in holding the floor. He has demonstrated his prowess in holding the floor and holding anything he wishes to hold.

Mr. President, I will propound this proposition—I am doing it somewhat on my own responsibility, and I have not conferred with Senators that should have been conferred with. I will ask if this sort of a proposition for unanimous consent could be considered favorably. I am not formally propounding it, because that would involve a roll call:

That the Senate, so soon as the consent is agreed to, if it be agreed to, shall recess—this is Saturday, the 5th—that we will convene on Saturday the 5th, to-day, at 10 o'clock a. m.; that any member of the Finance Committee who desires it shall have 4 hours; that we will be in session 14 hours, from 10 a. m. to 12 p. m.; that any member of the Finance Committee wishing it shall have 4 hours; that we will then recess at 12 o'clock until Monday at 10 o'clock; that we will resume the consideration of the bill on Monday at 10 o'clock, and every Senator shall thereafter have 10 minutes on every amendment proposed, with no time limit set for a vote, and a Senator who has 10 minutes to his credit may yield it to another Senator if he desires.

Have I made it clear?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has made it quite clear except in one respect, Mr. President. There are 16 members of the committee, and 4 times 16 is a greater number of hours than are provided in the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ASHURST. I know, Mr. President, and the Senator knows, that we are making a very earnest effort to reach some time when there can be a vote; and I think that can be agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, why this great preference to a member of the Committee on Finance?

Mr. ASHURST. All right; then I will withdraw that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. As I figure it, 4 hours is 240 minutes, and the Senator suggests that other Senators who do not happen to belong to the Committee on Finance shall have 10 minutes. In other words, members of the Committee on Finance shall have twenty-four times as much time as Senators who are not members of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ASHURST. I will withdraw that part of the proposed agreement which limits the four hours on to-day to members of the Finance Committee. Of course, it means that only three Senators could hold the floor to-day; but that is the lowest common denominator or the greatest common divisor, I do not know which, that we can reach. Will the Senator from Missouri agree to that?

Mr. REED. I have not heard a word of it.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Missouri says he has not heard a word I have said.

Mr. REED. I beg the Senator's pardon. I mean no disrespect, but there were two Senators talking to me.

Mr. ASHURST. I submit the proposed agreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator will pardon the Chair, the Secretary advises the Chair that he has written out the proposal of the Senator.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank him, and I will ask that it be read, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate will now take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. Saturday, November 5, 1921; that on the calendar day of Saturday, November 5, aforesaid, the Senate will remain in session until 12 o'clock midnight, and upon said day a Senator who is a member of the Finance Committee may speak for a period of not more than — hours.

Mr. ASHURST. Say "any Senator securing recognition" instead of "a member of the Finance Committee," if you please.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May speak four hours?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ASHURST. I have not the floor. The Senator from Missouri has it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I simply wish to say that as I hear the proposed unanimous-consent agreement read, the fundamental basis of it is such that I should have to object to it.

Mr. ASHURST. I will withdraw the part of the language which grants to the Finance Committee any particular privilege in the way of time. Just say "any Senator."

Mr. WADSWORTH. Any Senator may speak four hours?

Mr. ASHURST. Any Senator.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Four hours—one Senator?

Mr. STANLEY. Yes. You would not cut him off with less than that, would you?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. We shall have homicide here. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order. The question is upon the request of the Senator from Arizona for unanimous consent which has been stated by the Secretary. Is there objection?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I object, Mr. President, to any unanimous-consent agreement to permit a Senator to speak for four hours.

Mr. ASHURST. Then I will make it three hours. I will ask the Secretary to change it to three hours.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will object to that, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before it is objected to can not some of us hear it? I should like to hear it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the proposed unanimous-consent agreement, at the request of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate will now take a recess until 10 a. m. Saturday, November 5, 1921; that on the calendar day of Saturday, November 5, aforesaid, the Senate will remain in session until 12 o'clock midnight, and upon said day no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than one hour in the aggregate upon the bill and amendments offered thereto; that at 12 o'clock midnight on the said day the Senate will take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. on the calendar day of Monday, November 7, 1921, and that from the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. on the last-named calendar day and thenceforward no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes upon any amendment that may then be pending or that may be offered, unless the Senate by unanimous consent shall give the Senator permission to proceed for some longer period.

Mr. ASHURST. No; the one I submitted was that a Senator having 10 minutes to his credit could yield it to another Senator.

Mr. LODGE. That can not be done. That means no end at all.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I objected to the unanimous-consent agreement which was proposed this afternoon. I did that solely upon this ground, that I have often taken the position that we should not fix a definite time for final voting; but I have always been willing to limit debate, and I am willing now to agree that on Monday morning, Tuesday morning, or this morning, we shall limit the debate in any reasonable way. Personally, I am willing that it should be limited to 10 minutes on any question that comes before the Senate. I am not at all disposed to prolong the discussion on this bill, or delay its passage, and it seems to me that it would be a reasonable arrangement if we simply agree now that on Monday morning debate by any Senator shall be limited to 10 minutes on any question which may come before the Senate respecting this bill. If we can enter into that sort of an agreement, I am sure we will soon reach a final conclusion on the bill, and that will give all of to-day to those Senators who desire to discuss the bill or any provision of it at length.

I therefore make the proposal that we now take a recess until 10 o'clock this morning, that we remain in session until 12 o'clock to-night, and that on Monday at 10 o'clock we meet again, and debate then shall be limited to 10 minutes by any Senator upon any one question before the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. How long does the Senator propose the debate shall last to-day; to what extent would he limit it?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Until 12 o'clock to-night.

Mr. McCUMBER. I mean, what time should be allowed to any one Senator?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. As long as he wants.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I might as well say with great frankness to the Senate that I proposed this bonus amendment, and I intend to have time enough to debate it, because I think it is the most important amendment which has been offered to the bill; but I do not intend to be unreasonable about that demand for time. If that amendment could be taken up this morning and discussed to-day without limit—that is, that no Senator should be limited in his speeches to-day—I would propose that we meet at 10 o'clock this morning and stay in session——

Mr. MOSES. Until midnight.

Mr. REED. No; 10 o'clock at night is a late enough hour.

Mr. LODGE. Make it 12 o'clock.

Mr. REED. Very well, 12 o'clock; and that that amendment be taken up to-morrow and be kept before the Senate until it is disposed of, and that after to-morrow no Senator shall speak more than 10 minutes on any amendment.

Mr. LODGE. Or on the bill.

Mr. REED. Or on the bill. I would let any Senator speak on each amendment 10 minutes if he wants to.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I am willing to make that sort of an arrangement. Therefore I make that proposition. I do not mean that the whole of to-day shall necessarily be taken up with the bonus amendment, but I want the bonus amendment discussed to-day and disposed of to-day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have some amendments which I want to propose to-day and want to have disposed of to-day.

Mr. MOSES. There will be 14 hours between 10 o'clock and midnight.

Mr. REED. Let us hear the proposed agreement read, and then we will see what the proposition of the Senator from Wisconsin is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate will now take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m. Saturday, November 5, 1921; that on the calendar day of Saturday, November 5, aforesaid, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of what are known as the soldiers' bonus amendments, and will proceed with the consideration of the same until they are disposed of.

Mr. SIMMONS. Would the Senator from Missouri cut off the Senator from Wisconsin? He has seven or eight amendments which he desires to discuss to-day. Would not the Senator from Missouri be willing to agree that the bonus amendments shall be disposed of by 2 o'clock in the afternoon?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would be entirely satisfactory to me.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would give us six hours to discuss the bonus amendment, and eight hours for any other amendments on which we do not wish to limit debate.

Mr. REED. I am in this embarrassing position, Mr. President. There are six or seven Senators on this side who have said to me that they want to speak on the bonus amendments; how long, I do not know. Let me make this suggestion: Suppose we give the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin the right of way from 10 o'clock a. m. to-day until 2, and agree that then the bonus amendments be made the business of the Senate, and be continued before the Senate without limitation until they are disposed of, provided they are disposed of by 12 o'clock to-night. If we get through with them before that time, then the Senator from Wisconsin can have the rest of the time for his amendment. Will it be satisfactory to the Senator from Wisconsin to have from 10 o'clock until 2?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That would give the Senator how many hours on the bonus amendment?

Mr. REED. Ten hours. I do not think it will take that long, but it might.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask the Senator to give me until 3 o'clock on my amendments.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Missouri in all candor, is it his expectation that one or two Senators or even three or four will take all the time allotted to that amendment, cutting out those who want to make 10 or 20 minute speeches?

Mr. REED. I think not. I am entirely willing if it can be arranged that the time shall be divided between the proponents and the opponents of the amendment.

Mr. LENROOT. They could alternate.

Mr. REED. We will have to leave it to the decency of Senators with reference to their colleagues on the same side of the question. I think we can arrange that.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Let me suggest that the time might be divided, half of it put at the disposal of the Senator from Missouri, and if there is any Senator who wants to oppose the amendment, put the other half in his charge.

Mr. REED. If I am allowed to have any sort of control, by way of suggestion, on this side, I will see to it that we give the other side of the Chamber plenty of time, as a matter of common courtesy and decency, if you trust that to us.

Mr. LENROOT. There will be no trouble about that.

Mr. REED. I make this suggestion, then; that the Senate now take a recess until this morning at 10 o'clock; that the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] which he desires to present, shall have the right of way up to the hour of 3 o'clock; that then the bonus amendments shall come on for consideration and shall remain before the Senate until disposed of——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Provided they are disposed of by 12 o'clock to-night.

Mr. REED. And that the Senate shall take a recess not later than 12 o'clock to-night. Also, that on Monday the Senate shall convene at 10 o'clock, and that the debate on Monday and thereafter shall be limited to 10 minutes, and that no Senator shall be permitted on Monday to speak more than 10 minutes in all on any amendment and 10 minutes on the bill. That will bring us to a conclusion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have no idea that the amendments which I shall present will occupy all the time from 10 o'clock until 3, and yet I would like to have that much time allotted to them in the event that there should be debate on the other side.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator does not want to use all the time, he can yield it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It can be passed on.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In that event we could bring up the bonus amendment sooner.

Mr. REED. When the Secretary gets the agreement perfected let it be read and then we can see if it is in proper form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proposed agreement.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

It is agreed by unanimous consent that the Senate will now take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m., Saturday, November 5, 1921; that on the calendar day of Saturday, November 5, aforesaid, the Senate will remain in session until not later than 12 o'clock midnight; that at 10 o'clock a. m. on said day the Senate will proceed at once to the consideration of amendments that may be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and will continue such consideration until the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. unless the amendments are sooner disposed of, and that as soon as such amendments are disposed of, and not later than 3 o'clock p. m., the Senate will proceed to the consideration of what are known as the "soldiers' adjusted compensation" amendments and will continue such consideration until the hour of 12 o'clock midnight, unless such amendments are sooner disposed of.

It is further agreed that when such amendments are disposed of, and at not later than 12 o'clock midnight, the Senate will take a recess until 10 o'clock a. m., on the calendar day of Monday, November 7, 1921, and that from the hour of 10 o'clock a. m. on the last-named calendar day and thenceforward, no Senator shall speak more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes upon any amendment that may then be pending or that may be offered, or more than once or for a longer period than 10 minutes upon the bill.

Mr. REED. There is only one thing that I might suggest. That might compel us to stay in session until to-night at 12 o'clock when we might be through before.

Mr. SPENCER. Let it read "until 12 o'clock to-night or until said bonus amendments are disposed of."

Mr. NEW. "Unless said bonus amendments are sooner disposed of."

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. That portion of the agreement now reads—on what are known as the soldiers' adjusted compensation amendments will continue such consideration until the hour of 12 o'clock midnight unless such amendments are sooner disposed of.

Mr. REED. That is all right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on entering into the unanimous-consent agreement. Is there objection?

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President, I object. I object just for one moment. I wish to be advised, if anyone is competent or disposed to advise me, whether debate is to go on forever beginning on Monday next. What is the probable limitation?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Ten minutes to each Senator on an amendment.

Mr. REED. I will say to the Senator from California that we have had such agreements many times, and I have never known the debate to last more than one day.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. We had it on the packers' bill, and we disposed of that bill in one day.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. There are some Senators who might be disposed to put in about 40 amendments and if each Senator under the suggested unanimous-consent agreement is to be permitted to speak 10 minutes on each of the 40 amendments I am curious to know when we would come to an end of the debate. I do not like to see one or two Senators run the Senate.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I believe that the experience of Senators will satisfy the Senator from California. I realize fully his point of view and I appreciate fully his concern, but we have frequently entered into such agreements. I suppose that I perhaps more than any other Senator, have always insisted upon some such agreement as this, and it has invariably worked in an admirable way. I have not the slightest doubt that if the arrangement is entered into the bill will be disposed of Monday night.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I will say to the Senator from California that arrangements like this have hitherto been entered into and have worked out very satisfactorily. There are two restraining influences to prevent the very thing the Senator fears. One is the fact that Senators are bound to regard some degree of courtesy in an arrangement of this kind, and another is that if any Senator were to introduce a large number of amendments for the purpose of making speeches he would be pilloried not only here, but in public opinion throughout the United States, and no Senator would dare stand up in a filibuster of that kind.

Mr. KING. Let me say to the Senator from California that in addition to that, such amendments would be regarded as out of order and the Chair would not entertain them.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the Senator from California if there is any such vast number of amendments offered, a motion to lay on the table the amendments would take care of the situation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am not convinced, but I am persuaded. Therefore I shall not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to entering into the unanimous-consent agreement? Without objection, the unanimous-consent agreement is entered into.

RECESS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate take a recess until 10 o'clock this morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 1 o'clock and 8 minutes a. m., Saturday, November 5, 1921) the Senate took a recess until Saturday, November 5, 1921, at 10 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, November 4, 1921.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our God and our Father help us, just now, to approach Thee reverently and humbly, with a conscious dependence upon Thy strength and Thy mercy. We think of Thy Fatherhood and our unworthy childhood and it is the supreme comfort of our little lives that they are still precious in Thy sight. O God of the years, O God of the eternities, keep us steady and true, strong and faithful through our transient days. In the name of Jesus our Savior and Teacher. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

HUBERT REYNOLDS.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, on the last day on which we had the private calendar there was a bill H. R. 2003, for the relief of Hubert Reynolds, which was reported by the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to the House with a favorable recommendation, but the House adjourned before action. I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and on a division (demanded by Mr. STAFFORD) there were—37 ayes and 13 noes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present, and I challenge the vote for that reason.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 215, nays 43, answered "present" 3, not voting 171, as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its chief clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill:

S. 1072. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1916, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RICKETTS, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following joint resolution:

H. J. Res. 215. Joint resolution to declare November 11, 1921, a legal public holiday.

BILLS ON THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the purpose of considering bills on the Private Calendar, and pending that motion I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bills be limited to 30 minutes each, 15 minutes on each side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that on each bill the general debate be limited to 30 minutes, 15 minutes to a side. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there are some bills involving large appropriations, particularly one in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania is interested, providing for an appropriation of a quarter of a million dollars, which should have much more debate than 15 minutes on a side. Therefore I object.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I would state to the gentleman that I would give plenty of time for the consideration of the bill under the five-minute rule.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the first bill.

ROLPH NAVIGATION & COAL CO.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5923) for the relief of the Rolph Navigation & Coal Co.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, a similar Senate bill is on the calendar, reported favorably by the committee. I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over for the present, holding its place on the calendar. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is the Senate bill identical in character with the House bill? If so, why not ask to have the Senate bill substituted for the House bill?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Senate bill covers two cases of collision and the House bill covers only one case of collision. Therefore I would rather take up the Senate bill, it having passed the Senate, and consider both of these cases together. Both cases have been reported favorably by the House.

Mr. STAFFORD. There can not be much objection to the present bill, and yet there may be objection to the Senate bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would rather take up the Senate bill. I do not think there will be any objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2866) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent to parties named herein certain lands in Louisiana.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I suppose general debate will be in order after the bill is read?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the payment of $1.25 per acre, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell and issue patent to the parties named and for the lands described as follows:

To R. E. Barham the northwest quarter of southwest quarter section 25, township 19 north, range 6 east, Louisiana meridian.

To H. O. Blanks the north half of northeast quarter section 24, township 23 north, range 8 east, Louisiana meridian.

To Mrs. Sallie Loyd and Mrs. Jemmie D. Scott the southwest quarter of southeast quarter section 35, township 23 north, range 7 east, Louisiana meridian.

To B. B. Williams the southeast quarter of northwest quarter section 25, township 19 north, range 6 east, Louisiana meridian.

To J. P. Madison the northeast quarter of southwest quarter section 25, township 19 north, range 6 east, Louisiana meridian.

Lands of which the said parties and their grantors have had the actual possession, beneficial use, and enjoyment for more than 30 years, under color of title derived from the State of Louisiana, believing themselves to be owners in good faith: Provided, That proper application and payment for purchase of said lands be filed hereunder in the district land office within six months after the approval of this act, and that no adverse claim thereto be officially of record as pending when the application is allowed and the sale consummated.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON], the author of the bill, may be recognized to make the explanation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for one hour.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, this is the same bill that was up some days ago and the object of it is to perfect the title of certain settlers who believed themselves to be owners of certain lands in the State of Louisiana described in the bill. All of those who are familiar with the swamp-land grants can very readily understand the issues involved in this case. Under the acts of 1849 and 1850 Congress donated to the State of Louisiana all of the swamp and overflowed lands in that State for the purpose of levee construction and flood control and for the purpose of reclaiming and making the land habitable. The lands that were to be designated as swamp lands were selected under the authority of the Secretary of the Interior. This was usually done by the State authorities under his direction. Those selections were submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and were termed "State selections," and the act of approval by the Secretary was necessary to complete the title in the State. It so happened, as in these cases, that the State of Louisiana, after selecting the lands as swamp and overflowed lands, sold the lands to certain settlers and received the price of the lands. It is shown in every instance that the sales were made something more than 60 years ago, and also, with two exceptions, that the purchasers who purchased the land and paid the State have been in actual possession for more than 30 years, and in the two excepted cases for more than 25 years. These lands were never approved by the Secretary of the Interior. That may have been the fault of the State; it was not the fault of the men who purchased the lands and paid the State. They are owners in good faith for cash considerations and have been in possession and paying taxes on the lands anywhere from 30 to 40 years.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Are any of these lands in litigation now?

Mr. WILSON. No. Since it became known that the titles were not good and that the Federal Government still held a claim, or that they had not been approved, there have been attempts to homestead some of the lands.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Did the Government ever dispose of these lands to any individuals since it granted the lands to the State of Louisiana?

Mr. WILSON. No. There are probably two homestead applications, but the Secretary of the Land Office takes care of that, and had me write in the bill that at the time this purchase may be made there shall be no adverse claim pending, so that leaves the homesteader, if he has any rights, just where he was, and he can go ahead. He is protected.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Are these agricultural lands?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What is their approximate value?

Mr. WILSON. That would be hard to tell. You may take one 40-acre tract, and half of it would be in cultivation and the other half in low swamp. Some of them are probably worth $10 and some of them $25 an acre. Some of them are in fields, and with the improvements it would be hard to say what they are worth. These people have improved them and have been in possession of them. I would not be able to state the value.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I notice in the bill that the gentleman recites—

> Lands of which the said parties and their grantors have had the actual possesion, beneficial use, and enjoyment for more than 30 years, under color of title derived from the State of Louisiana, believing themselves to be owners in good faith.

Does the gentleman think the Congress ought to put that into the bill? As a matter of fact it is not accurate that they have been in possession for 30 years, some of them?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; all except two, and they have been in possession more than 25 years.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman think that the recital ought to——

Mr. WILSON. That is one of the considerations upon which the Land Department recommends the sale of this land at the minimum price of $1.25 an acre, which they would not do except where the man is in possession, as I understand it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But does not the gentleman think that the recital in there on the subject ought to be accurate?

Mr. WILSON. Well, it is accurate.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think the report stated that only part of this had been held for 30 years.

Mr. WILSON. Of course, when the bill was written I found on examination of the abstracts there were two tracts that the possession did not run quite 30 years, and it was so stated in the report in order to be accurate. All of these, with two exceptions, have been in possession more than 30 years and more than 40 years.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The report is accurate, but the bill is not accurate.

Mr. WILSON. After the bill was written I found these two were a little short of 30 years, although it would be all the same as far as the land office was concerned.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does not the gentleman think he ought to strike out of the bill altogether the recital?

Mr. WILSON. It has been customary to have the recital in order to inform the House of the basis of the equities in favor of the present possessors and owners of the land.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What would constitute an adverse claim officially of record?

Mr. WILSON. Anything that the United States Land Office recognized as an adverse claim.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. As I take it from the bill, there were no homesteaders on this land originally?

Mr. WILSON. No; not until recently.

Mr. DOWELL. The ones who have possession of the land merely took possession without any title or without any color of title?

Mr. WILSON. The persons who have attempted to homestead?

Mr. DOWELL. Originally.

Mr. WILSON. No; the persons who originally took possession, the people whom the bill is to relieve, are those who bought from the State or hold through titles derived from the State. They are purchases made in 1859 and 1860, and since that time all these people——

Mr. DOWELL. Have they received title from the State?

Mr. WILSON. Yes; they have received title from the State and have been in possession and paid taxes for 30 years, with two exceptions being for more than 25 years.

Mr. DOWELL. The homesteaders who have homesteaded since that time have what is known as adverse possession and are in possession of this land; is that true?

Mr. WILSON. I think there is only one attempt to take adverse possession; but in order to protect them, if they have any rights, the Department of the Interior had written into the bill that no adverse claim should be officially pending at the time this sale is made.

Mr. DOWELL. In what position will the homesteader be who has actually taken possession of the homestead?

Mr. WILSON. Just exactly as it is before this is passed.

Mr. DOWELL. Well, if the original claimant is in possession of the property and has his title, and the homesteader is adverse to the present owner, would not there be a conflict?

Mr. WILSON. No; because applications for homesteads must be removed before this sale is made by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. DOWELL. Are any of the parties named in the bill homesteaders on the property?

Mr. WILSON. No; they all hold through the State; every man named in the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Is there anything in the bill about attempting to homestead the property?

Mr. WILSON. In one instance there was a military warrant placed by one of the persons named in the bill on one description.

Mr. DOWELL. Of those who have attempted to homestead, are any of the persons in possession of any of this property, persons who have attempted to homestead any land adversely to the persons named by this bill?

Mr. WILSON. Is there a dual possession?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. According to the record, in once instance.

Mr. DOWELL. In what situation will that leave the homesteader?

Mr. WILSON. This question is in a contest before the Secretary of the Interior between the claimant and the State in reference to this 40 acres. If the final decision should be rendered in favor of the man named in the bill, of course the Secretary of the Interior will sell the land to him at $1.25 an acre.

Mr. DOWELL. Will not this legislation affect the pending suit in reference to the title to that property?

Mr. WILSON. Not at all.

Mr. DOWELL. Should there not be a provision in this bill that it shall not affect pending litigation?

Mr. WILSON. It is in there, placed in there at the instance of the Land Office. It says that no claim shall be officially pending when the sale is made as authorized by this bill.

Mr. DOWELL. What do you mean by "pending"? Any suit that has been begun?

Mr. WILSON. Any suit that is officially pending in the United States Land Office, just as this homestead claim would be.

Mr. DOWELL. Assuming there would be litigation over this question in the courts as to who is entitled to the possession of the land?

Mr. WILSON. The only litigation that could come up, I will say to the gentleman, over the validity of this homestead entry would come up before the Secretary of the Interior. The courts have not anything to do with that.

Mr. DOWELL. The court might have jurisdiction in reference to the ownership of the land.

Mr. WILSON. The Secretary of the Interior would take notice of only those claims pending in the Land Office.

Mr. DOWELL. But may there not be a legal claim that could be enforced through a court procedure as between the original owner in possession and the one who attempted to homestead?

Mr. WILSON. No; there could not; because if this homestead claim should be recognized by the Land Office, where it is officially pending at this time, why, then the title would go to the homesteader. If not, why, then the sale would be made under this bill to the person who purchased from the State and who is in possession.

Mr. DOWELL. And under this bill you say the title will not be affected by this legislation?

Mr. WILSON. No.

Mr. CLOUSE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. I yield.

Mr. CLOUSE. I notice in the bill it says that the claimants to this land have been in possession for a period of some 30 years under color of title derived from the State of Louisiana. In the letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior of May 19 last he says, in addressing the chairman of the committee:

The bill states that the said parties and their grantors have had possession of these lands for more than 30 years under color of title derived from the State of Louisiana. But the abstracts of title furnished to you by Hon. Riley J. Wilson, who introduced the bill, show that there is no record of patent from the State to any of these lands except—

And then he gives the description. Will the gentleman explain what is meant by that language on the part of the Acting Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WILSON. That language on the part of the Acting Secretary of the Interior is just a little bit harsh from my point of view, as sale may be shown without a patent. What was submitted to the Committee on Public Lands and to the Land Office was a certificate from the register of the State land office of the State of Louisiana, just as stated, and which the committee examined, showing the sale of each description and the price for for which it is sold, and the date of the sale, under the seal of the State.

Mr. CLOUSE. As a matter of fact, the State did make the sale of this property to these various claimants?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. And undertook to give them evidence of immunity of title?

Mr. WILSON. There is no question about that. The Committee on Public Lands was given a certificate from the State land office, showing the date of the sale and everything connected with it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I do not understand exactly the theory. As I understand it, however, these people are rightfully entitled to this land and would have title to it if it was not for the technicality that the list of swamp lands was not approved by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. They purchased them from the State. After this act was passed the State made certain selections as swamp land.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I know they did.

Mr. WILSON. And, of course, the actual approval of the Secretary of the Interior was necessary to complete the title to the State. It is found in a great many instances the State sold its selection, and that the act of approval was never secured, but the settler in Louisiana bought and paid his money for them and has been in possession since.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. We have thousands of acres of such land in Illinois, and I am somewhat conversant with it. I am wondering why the State of Louisiana has not since had this list approved?

Mr. WILSON. Well, that is a matter that has been in controversy for years over certain swamp-land selection. Of course the conditions are not the same in many locations as when these lands were granted to the States, because the act says lands unfit for cultivation, but for carrying out the purposes of the act for levee construction, flood protection, and drainage they are subject to and fit for cultivation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. If these people are settled there, and their titles are all right—and I feel they are, if they are like settlers in my own country—why should they pay $1.25 an acre?

Mr. WILSON. It is the custom in the Land Office and custom in the Committee on the Public Lands when this kind of procedure is had, that they sell it at a minimum price of $1.25 an acre, and the people are glad to pay that to get their title settled.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. They ought not to be compelled to do it.

Mr. WILSON. They are glad to do it, and that has been the custom. We have passed a number of these bills here.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Which land is it to which there is an adverse claim?

Mr. STAFFORD. I would ask the gentleman's attention to page 4 of the report.

Mr. WILSON. It is tract No. 7. It is in contest before the Interior Department between George Neely and the present purchaser.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Do you not think that ought to be excepted from the act?

Mr. WILSON. That matter came up when the bill was written. By the way, that is always covered by the Land Office. It says:

Provided, That no adverse claim thereto is officially of record as pending when the application is allowed and the sale is consummated.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is, pending in the Land Office?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. That is the only place where it can be pending.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. A claim might arise from some other source.

Mr. WILSON. The Land Office would not pay attention to a claim arising in Louisiana not connected with any act of Government, because they recognize the equity of this man who has purchased the land and has possession of it. But where a man files a homestead application, whether just or unjust, where he is simply trying to divest the owner, finding that this is not approved, or holding it up, or whatever he is trying to do, the Land Office, after the filing of that application, feels under obligation to see that it is not pending when a sale is made.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Then the gentleman feels that this act will be of great advantage to Clark and Kirkpatrick in that litigation?

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why not?

Mr. WILSON. Because the Department of the Interior will not sell this land to Clark and Kirkpatrick until this matter is settled about the application of Neeley to homestead it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That would govern, of course, as far as homesteading is concerned, but if there was a litigation arising from any other source it would not apply?

Mr. WILSON. That might be true.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. DRIVER. This does not direct the commissioner to pass the title, but simply directs the commissioner, on the payment of a certain amount of money, to issue the patent.

Mr. WILSON. Authorizes him.

Mr. DRIVER. Yes; authorizes him to issue a patent, and a patent on the homestead must issue, but it is still left in the discretion of the Secretary to issue it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I call the gentleman's attention to page 3 of the hearings, to a letter from the Acting Secretary, paragraph 2, in which it is stated that hearings have been held with reference to certain of these tracts of land, and that these hearings show that those tracts were dry lands and fit for cultivation, and the swamp-land claim thereto was finally rejected by the commissioner on October 7, 1920.

Mr. WILSON. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It would seem, then, that the Land Office of the Federal Government has rejected the State's claim to some of these lands.

Mr. WILSON. I intended to cover that in the statement I made a while ago. The gentleman must remember that these lands were sold in 1859 and 1860, more than 60 years ago, to these purchasers, and in the carrying out of the purpose for which those lands were granted to the State there are a great many lands the field notes of which would show, or probably investigation now would show, that they are dry and fit for cultivation, when they were not dry and fit for cultivation then.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Were these hearings last year held as relating to an application made at that time?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. The hearings have been held recently. I do not know the exact time. They go on all the time, as to whether or not the swampy character of the land can be sustained.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Could not the hearing be had as of the date when the State actually made the selection?

Mr. WILSON. I do not know that you can get the evidence as of that date. In some instances they took the field notes and in some instances they made investigation. But the Secretary of the Interior raises no objection to the passage of this legislation for the relief of those people.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I notice in the closing paragraph of the letter to the Acting Secretary that he says:

As the bill provides that these lands shall be free from adverse claim before purchase and patent thereunder, no objection to its enactment is urged by me.

But as a matter of fact the effect of this bill will be that these lands will be placed on sale and the Commissioner of the Land Office directed to sell these particular lands at this particular place to these particular people.

Mr. WILSON. He is authorized to do so.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Well, the authorization is a direction, is it not, if they have the price?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. To the settler, who was a settler in that State.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I say it is more than an authorization. If these people come and offer the price, he must give them the patent to the land if there is no adverse claim pending?

Mr. WILSON. Yes. I hope that is true.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BENHAM rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. BENHAM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I wish to make a brief statement. One week from to-day an unknown American soldier, who gave up his life on a battle field of France, will be buried at Arlington. The ceremonials on that occasion will fittingly typify the reverence of the American people for our American dead, who died that civilization might live.

The first on the list of those chosen to represent the War Department in these ceremonials is Sergt. Samuel Woodfill, who is officially rated by Gen. Pershing, commander of the American Expeditionary Forces, as first in the list of the many heroes in those forces.

Sergt. Woodfill enlisted from our district—fourth Indiana—in 1901, and although but little past 38 years of age is accredited with 30 years 5 months of service. Nine of his 21 years of active service was spent abroad, for which he was given double credit.

I am sending to the desk a copy of General Order No. 16, bearing date of January 22, 1919, signed by Gen. P. C. March, Chief of Staff, and Adjt. Gen. P. C. Harris, a part of which I am asking that the Clerk read at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the paragraph from a certain general order be read in his time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Samuel Woodfill, first lieutenant, Sixtieth Infantry. For conspicuous gallantry and intrepidity above and beyond the call of duty in action with the enemy at Cunel, France, October 12, 1918. While he was leading his company against the enemy his line came under heavy machine-gun fire, which threatened to hold up the advance. Followed by two soldiers at 25 yards, this officer went out ahead of his first line toward a machine-gun nest and worked his way around its flank, leaving the two soldiers in front. When he got within 10 yards of the gun it ceased firing and four of the enemy appeared, three of whom were shot by Lieut. Woodfill. The fourth, an officer, rushed at Lieut. Woodfill, who attempted to club the officer with his rifle. After a hand-to-hand struggle, Lieut. Woodfill killed the officer with his pistol. His company thereupon continued to advance until shortly afterwards another machine-gun nest was encountered. Calling on his men to follow, Lieut. Woodfill rushed ahead of his line in the face of heavy fire from the nest, and when several of the enemy appeared above the nest he shot them, capturing three other members of the crew and silencing the gun. A few minutes later this officer for the third time demonstrated conspicuous daring by charging another machine-gun position, killing five men in one machine-gun pit with his rifle. He then drew his revolver and started to jump into the pit when the two other gunners only a few yards away turned their gun on him. Failing to kill them with his revolver, he grabbed a pick lying near by and killed both of them. Inspired by the exceptional courage displayed by this officer, his men pressed on to their objective under severe shell and machine-gun fire.

[Applause.]

Mr. BENHAM. Some months ago this House was honored by a visit from the gallant Tennesseean, Sergt York, who made the largest individual capture of the enemies' forces. On the occasion of his visit Sergt. York was given a reception in the east end of the Hall near the room of the Ways and Means Committee. After a brief statement in regard to Lieut. Woodfill's service in the World War by one of his commanding officers, Maj. WOODRUFF, a Member of this House, the sergeant can be met by those who care to do so in the hall near the Ways and Means Committee room. The sergeant is now in the Members' Gallery.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to extend my remarks by having inserted in the RECORD the official service record of Sergt. Woodfill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated by him. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUFF. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. BENHAM. Yes. [Applause, the Members rising.]

Mr. WOODRUFF. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, it is a matter of great regret to me that I could not have been Lieut. Woodfill's commanding officer when he earned the distinction that was accorded him in the general order just read to this House. My association with the now Sergt., then Lieut., Woodfill came after the signing of the armistice.

Within a few days after the signing of the armistice I was sent to the Bordeaux embarkation camp for duty along with some 160 other officers. I was assigned to certain duties, among them being commanding officer of the different casuals coming through the camp. We divided those casuals into eight companies. They were coming in and leaving constantly, coming into the camp, having their records straightened out, getting their physical examinations, being properly equipped, and then being sent to the United States. One of the commanding officers of one of these companies was the then Lieut. Woodfill. He served under me there for five or six weeks, and I want to say that in that work he showed the same efficiency, the same devotion to duty, that he showed in the Argonne. [Applause.]

The duties of the camp were somewhat onerous. We were compelled to work from early morning until late at night, and sometimes all night, getting the men through the camp and on their way home, and I found amongst the officers with whom I worked one of the most willing, one of the most earnest, one of the most efficient officers I had under me was Lieut. Woodfill. [Applause.] He was a man of most becoming modesty. He was with us for four or five or possibly six weeks, and no one among us ever had the slightest idea that he had during the war done anything out of the ordinary. By no word or act of his did he attempt to call the attention of his comrades to anything that had been done by himself. [Applause.] One day he walked into my office and said, "Captain, I have got to go to Chaumont." I said, "All right, Lieutenant. How long will you be gone?" He said, "Three or four days." He went to Chaumont and came back again. A week or 10 days after his return to the camp I happened to see General Order 16, which cited the lieutenant in the way you have just heard, and learned for the first time Lieut. Woodfill had been ordered to Chaumont to receive the congressional medal, the highest American decoration. And up to that time no member of the camp had known why Lieut. Woodfill was called to Chaumont. So I said to the lieutenant, not letting him know I had seen the general order, "Lieutenant, have you seen any action in this war?" He said, "Yes." I said, "Have you killed anybody?" "Yes," he returned. "How many have you killed?" I asked. "I only know of 19," he said. [Applause.] I said, "How long were you in action?" His answer was, "About two hours." [Laughter.] And really, gentlemen, the way the lieutenant said that to me led me to believe that he felt that he really should have done better than that. [Laughter.]

When I read in the paper the other day that Lieut., now Sergt., Woodfill was here, I read the article with pleasure and regret. Pleasure, for I knew I would be afforded an opportunity to meet my old comrade again, and to renew the acquaintance that we made over there. I knew that he had been granted the great distinction of being the first man to be named as pallbearer to the unknown soldier to be buried at Arlington within a few days. I was pleased with that; but it was with regret that I learned that the then Lieut. Woodfill and later Capt. Woodfill was now a mere sergeant in the Army. I want to notify the House to-day that it is my intention within a few days to introduce a bill which will give to Sergt. Woodfill the rank that he earned on the battle fields of France. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] will proceed.

Mr. WILSON. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 23 minutes remaining.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, the House seems to be in a very good humor now, and I will reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I will not take the floor in general debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That upon the payment of $1.25 per acre, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell and issue patent to the parties named and for the lands described, as follows:

To R. E. Barham the northwest quarter of southwest quarter section 25, township 19 north, range 6 east, Louisiana meridian.

To H. O. Blanks the north half of northeast quarter section 24, township 23 north, range 8 east, Louisiana meridian.

To Mrs. Sallie Loyd and Mrs. Jemmie D. Scott the southwest quarter of southeast quarter section 35, township 23 north, range 7 east, Louisiana meridian.

To B. B. Williams the southeast quarter of northwest quarter section 25, township 19 north, range 6 east, Louisiana meridian.

To J. P. Madison the northeast quarter of southwest quarter section 25, township 19 north, range 6 east, Louisiana meridian.

To T. J. Haynes the south half of northeast quarter section 19, township 23 north, range 8 east, Louisiana meridian.

To G. E. Mott the northeast quarter of southeast quarter section 1, township 18 north, range 6 east, Louisiana meridian.

To Mrs. E. L. Hadley the southeast quarter of northeast quarter section 29, township 23 north, range 8 east, Louisiana meridian.

To Gabe Moss & Morehouse Planting Co. (Ltd.), the northeast quarter of northeast quarter and the southwest quarter of southwest quarter section 7, township 19 north, range 8 east, Louisiana meridian.

To Mrs. Alice Felton the southeast quarter of northeast quarter section 29, township 22 north, range 7 east, Louisiana meridian.

To E. M. Clark and W. P. Kirkpatrick the west half of southwest quarter section 30, township 21 north, range 8 east, Louisiana meridian.

Lands of which the said parties and their grantors have had the actual possession, beneficial use, and enjoyment for more than 30 years, under color of title derived from the State of Louisiana, believing themselves to be owners in good faith: Provided, That proper application and payment for purchase of said lands be filed hereunder in the district land office within six months after the approval of this act, and that no adverse claim thereto be officially of record as pending when the application is allowed and the sale consummated.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Since I asked for recognition under general debate there has been a change in the plans, and so I wish to obtain information that was not presented by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] during the general debate.

The report states that as to two of these quarters of quarter sections of land investigation is still being had as to whether they have any minerals on them. Will the gentleman from Louisiana kindly inform the House as to the general character of these lands? I direct his attention to the third numbered paragraph of the report of the Assistant Secretary, which states that—

3. Hearings were held as to the SE. ¼ NW. ¼ and NE. ¼ SW. ¼, sec. 25, T. 19 N., R. 6 E., which were entered as a homestead by Robert A. Eason, No. 07991, Baton Rouge.

I believe those two quarters of quarter sections refer to the lands set forth on page 2 of the bill between lines 5 to 10, as follows:

To B. B. Williams the SE. ¼ NW. ¼ sec. 25, T. 19 N., R. 6 E., Louisiana meridian.

To J. P. Madison the NE. ¼ SW. ¼ sec. 25, T. 19 N., R. 6 E., Louisiana meridian.

The report goes on further to state:

But such approval has not been had pending receipt of a mineral report from the United States Geological Survey.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman will notice that the Land Office takes the position that these selections should have been approved.

Mr. STAFFORD. I can not agree with the gentleman that the report says that the Land Office takes the position that these grants should be approved.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman did not read all of the paragraph.

Mr. STAFFORD. In fact, the report shows that these were not swamp lands, but that they were suitable for cultivation.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman let me read the other part of the paragraph?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. WILSON. It says:

After the homestead entry was canceled for the reason that the evidence submitted showed that the lands were occupied, it was held on February 25, 1921, by the then First Assistant Secretary of the Interior that the selections should have been approved under paragraph 1 of the instructions of October 1, 1903 (32 L. D., 270, 276), because they were based on affidavits of State witnesses.

Now, if these selections should have been approved and the Secretary of the Interior has found that it should have been approved after 1859 or 1860, the people are in possession of land which the Government itself admitted should belong to the State——

Mr. STAFFORD. I somewhat agree with the position taken by the gentleman, but I would like to inquire where there is any testimony showing that the lands were originally swamp lands that should have been classified as such and deeded to the State under the swamp land act of 1849.

Mr. WILSON. The committee report goes into that very thoroughly. They were selected by the State as swamp lands. The Secretary of the Interior holds that some of them should have been approved and others held for litigation. That is the exact state of affairs, but the fact remains that the land was selected, sold by the State, the money received some 60 years ago, and these settlers have been in possession, paying taxes on the land ever since. I do not know a case of that kind where the House has refused to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue a patent.

Mr. STAFFORD. Can the gentleman state whether there has been any similar instance in Louisiana or in his district or in the neighborhood, where the situation is similar to that covered in this case, where the lands that were claimed to be swamp lands, sold by the State, and then later the department found that they were agricultural lands and refused to patent them?

Mr. DRIVER. Will the gentleman from Louisiana yield to me?

Mr. WILSON. I will.

Mr. DRIVER. I will state that the records of the proceedings of this House disclose that in 1898 there was a compact entered into by the Land Office and the State of Arkansas to settle all controversies arising between the State of Arkansas and the United States growing out of the question of the character of land embraced in the swamp land act of September 28, 1850, passed by this body. The whole matter grew out of this very proposition that is before us now. The language of that act pertaining to lands in Arkansas is similar to the earlier act embracing the swamp lands in Louisiana. It provided for the passing of title to the swamp and overflowed land with the condition subsequent that made provision for the selection and certification of these swamp lands by the governor of the State, to be ratified and approved by the solicitor general of the Land Office. We made the selection, and the same question involved here was involved there.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Chair will state that the bill is in one section, and the Clerk says he had not completed reading that section when the gentleman from Wisconsin was inadvertently recognized. The Chair suggests that the reading of the bill be completed.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 3, line 4, strike out all of lines 4, 5, 6, 7, and the words "good faith" in line 8.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, it is evident to me, whatever may have been the practice by the committee in the past, that this language ought to go out. This is a statement such as a court would make in a decree in equity to quiet title to land, but it is not a statement such as a law-making body ought to make. We do not even know whether it recites the facts. It is a deduction or conclusion that ought to be drawn only after the taking of evidence and when the body making it may have some sort of judicial powers. We say here that these lands have been held by these parties and their grantors in actual possession for their beneficial use and enjoyment for more than 30 years under color of title derived from the State of Louisiana, believing themselves to be the owners in good faith. How do we or anybody else know that? If you get the relief, that is all you are asking for.

Mr. WILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WILSON. Why, Mr. Chairman, this is the language that we have used in a number of bills; I do not know how the custom grew up. I have no objection personally to that language going out if it is not considered good legislation.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I understand from the gentleman from Louisiana that he has no serious objection to my amendment. I think there is not any question but what the practice if it has been indulged in is a pad practice. The gentleman is getting what he asks for by the passage of the bill. It has been suggested that the word "provided" ought to go out, but I do not think so.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman objects to the statement that their possession is under deed from the State as a color of title.

Mr. GRAHAM. I do not know; I do not want to draw conclusions of fact in this bill. I am simply objecting to reciting that these parties were holding under color of title and have been in possession for a certain number of years.

Mr. WINGO. Is not that the proof before the committee, and is it not the basis of our action?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. No; I do not think so.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. As a matter of fact, the report shows that that statement is not accurate.

Mr. WILSON. This language was originally written in the Land Office by the solicitor.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That may be so.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know why the custom grew up, but I just assumed that it was put in there for the purpose of informing the Members of the House of the equities existing in favor of the men who hold the title from the State. They have been in possession all of these years.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The gentleman has no objection to it going out?

Mr. WILSON. No.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DRIVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Continuing now the statement I was making at the time I was interrupted, some controversy arose in the States to which these swamp lands were donated as to the meaning of the words "swamp and overflowed lands." Throughout this region there were some elevations, small, it is true, but they were lands that were higher than the average lands, locally known as ridges. These lands were surveyed with the other lands, lands that were subject to water stands, swampy in character. They, of course, were selected with the other lands; also some land along the foothills; and the highest ground, for instance, in Arkansas, along Crowleys Ridge, quite an elevation, was selected. Controversy arose between the State and the Government as to whether these particular lands that were high and fairly well drained came within the meaning of the words "swamp and overflowed lands." The State of Arkansas proceeded along the same theory that the State of Louisiana did. The very moment that act became effective, and before the selections were approved by the solicitor general, the State of Arkansas proceeded to issue certificates of entry to people in the swamp-land regions of that State. The State received the money from these applicants, and the applicants went into possession. Up as late as 1900 I had people coming into my office who had no title in the world in the way of a patent from the United States to the State of Arkansas. They had been in possession there for years and years, believing themselves to be owners of the land which they had improved and where they had made homes. When the matter was investigated it was ascertained that there were so many of those lands it became necessary to have some relief for those people. We, therefore, petitioned our Representatives in Congress, and a measure was introduced providing for a settlement and adjustment of these differences between the State and the Government, and our own State passed a ratification act to that settlement, made as between James P. Clarke, the attorney general of our State, representing the State of Arkansas, and the Land Office at Washington. That ratification act was passed in 1898. It seems that Louisiana, notwithstanding the publicity that act should have given, has failed even up to this time to have any such act passed to quiet title to these lands over controversies that arose just in the same way. The State ought to have done that. One man will not do it as a matter of course. It must be called to the attention of the State officials in such way and involve sufficient lands in the State to warrant the State officials to do these things. This has not been done. I investigated this case very carefully because of the fact of similar matters existing in my own district in Arkansas coming to my attention. I know the merit that is involved in this class of legislation. I know that these people have gone on believing that they have a title and have now become aroused to the fact that that is not true. I believe their attention was called to it by the filing of applications for entries on their homes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DRIVER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman know what the nature of the title of Clark and Kirkpatrick is, whether it is a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common?

Mr. DRIVER. I do not know. So far as that particular information is concerned, I think the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WILSON] can possibly tell the gentleman.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Does the gentleman know what title would pass by virtue of this act, whether it would be a joint tenancy or not?

Mr. WILSON. Whatever title was issued by the Secretary of the Interior. The abstract introduced before the committee simply shows that they are joint owners.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is there enough in the abstract that would give the full names of these parties?

Mr. DRIVER. The abstract would give that beyond any question.

Mr. WILSON. I do not know.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. One of these parties is Mrs. E. L. Hadley. Just as a matter of accuracy, I am wondering if the names ought not to be put in in conference or in the Senate, so that there will not have to be an act afterwards to quiet title.

Mr. WILSON. I think the Land Office would deal with that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The Land Office would have no authority to grant to anybody except under the specific name mentioned in this bill.

Mr. WILSON. The gentleman means that when the bill goes into conference it ought to be amended.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Before this bill finally becomes a law there ought to be in it the full names of these parties, and where there are two names it ought to be indicated whether it is a joint title or a tenancy in common. If this company is a corporation, which is mentioned here, that should be indicated, so that the title will be clear.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN LIBERTY LOAN SUBSCRIBERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5775) for the relief of Liberty loan subscribers of the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; and Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio.

The Clerk reported the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to receive, examine, and determine the claims of Liberty loan subscribers for losses suffered by them by reason of payments on Liberty bond purchases made through the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio; Robbinsdale State Bank, Robbinsdale, Minn.; and Farmers & Merchants State Bank, Kenmare, N. Dak.; for which bonds were not delivered on account of the failure of said banks, and to determine the amount of losses actually suffered by each claimant, not exceeding the amount paid by them, less all sums paid or to be paid said claimant upon the liquidation of said banks.

SEC. 2. That the amount of the loss actually suffered as so ascertained and determined shall be certified by said accounting officers to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall pay the same to said claimants out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said accounting officers may also, before the final liquidation of said banks, whenever they can determine the approximate amount to be paid to claimants hereunder, certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon have power to pay claimant such sum, upon the claimant assigning to the said Secretary for the benefit of the United States all interest he may have in any additional sum which may become payable to such claimant from said banks or the receiver thereof on account of his payment for such Liberty bonds: Provided, however, That no payment hereunder shall be given to any claimant found to be a director or officer of the failed banks at the time he became a subscriber for such bonds.

The Secretary of the Treasury shall have no power to act upon any claim hereunder not presented within six months after the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Liberty loan subscribers of the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; and Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio; Robbinsdale State Bank, Robbinsdale, Minn.; and Farmers & Merchants State Bank, Kenmare, N. Dak."

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, as the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] stated a short time ago, this is a bill in which I am personally interested. I am not interested in this bill because I am a subscriber for some of these bonds in these failed banks, but I am interested in the fact that one of these banks is in my district and I referred quite a few of these people who have subscribed for these Government bonds to this bank to subscribe.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I had no intention when I said "personal interest" to connote that the gentleman had any financial interest, but only to the fact that this bill had its genesis by reason of the failure of a State bank which is located in the district of the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is true.

Mr. STAFFORD. And that he introduced the bill.

Mr. EDMONDS. When this bill was first brought before the House it was intended to relieve three banks which we knew had failed, one of them a State bank, the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia. The other two banks, the Santa Rosa National Bank, of Santa Rosa, Calif., and the Mineral City Bank, of Mineral City, Ohio, were, I believe, national banks. The objection was made when this bill first came upon the floor that we should include in this bill all banks that had failed, and upon inquiry at the Treasury Department we found there were two other banks that of necessity would have to be included if you want to cover all the banks who have taken subscriptions for Liberty bonds and failed before they had delivered the bonds. The number of subscriptions covered by these bank failures was about 7,500. The average to the subscriber was about $35. Most of these people were paying for the bonds they subscribed for upon the installment plan. In the Philadelphia case the bank officials took this money; it was embezzled by some of the officers of the bank; the officers were tried, and some of them to-day are in jail.

Unfortunately the State courts decided that this money was a trust fund, and that the assets of the bank could not be used to pay the subscribers to the Liberty loan bonds, and that their only redress was personally against those who had taken the money. However, it is rather significant in this case that the Government officials, the different committees representing the sales of Liberty bonds in Philadelphia in all cases in this neighborhood being in a residence section where there were not many banks or trust companies, told the people to go to this bank to make subscriptions. We have had before the committee postal cards to people telling them to go to this bank. In the other cases the banks were probably in a similar situation except some were national banks, and part of the assets of those banks were used to pay back the subscribers. Now in this bill we direct the accounting officers of the Treasury to go over the accounts of these banks, get all the money they can for the subscribers and then make up the shortage to the subscribers for these bonds. Of course, the credit of the Government is at stake. These people did not subscribe to the bonds just because they favored any of the banks; they were subscribing to the bonds because they had considered the bank, and they had a right to consider it under the notices they received, as being an agency of the Government. The Government, of course, I suppose in the excitement of the times, could not protect itself from anything like embezzlement. The bill takes great care to say that all funds and liquidations should be credited up to the subscribers as far as can be collected, and also requires the claim of the parties should be assigned to the Government so that in case of anything turning up in the future where the subscriber could have gotten more money out of the bank or out of the receivers of the bank, as far as possible the Government would be able to collect that sum. You will note that Secretary Houston in his letter thinks we ought to make a direct appropriation to each one of these subscribers.

When you consider 7,500 subscribers, and each one practically requiring a separate bill for each subscriber, you realize that it would be an almost impossible matter for any committee of the Congress to gather together the data to make such an appropriation. Secretary Glass, though, says that he thinks that we ought to draw up a bill as we have drawn up this bill and that we should allow the Treasury officials to examine into these accounts and pay whatever shortage there should happen to be in the fund. The only difference between the recommendation of the Treasury Department and the committee recommendation would be the fact that we have included the stockholders. The Treasury Department thought that the officers of the bank, the trustees of the bank, and stockholders of the bank that had subscribed should not be reimbursed. I looked a little into that question when I was in Philadelphia, and I found out——

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the statement made by the gentleman as to the position of the Secretary of the Treasury accurate when he states that the only difference in the bill as reported and the recommendation of the committee is that the stockholders are given this privilege, whereas the bill as reported denies the privilege to the directors and officers?

Mr. EDMONDS. Is the gentleman speaking of the recommendation of Secretary Houston or Secretary Glass?

Mr. STAFFORD. Secretary Houston, Secretary Glass, and Secretary Mellon—all three.

Mr. EDMONDS. Secretary Glass's recommendation. The bill was drawn by the department while Mr. Glass was Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; and all three Secretaries of the Treasury, including the present Secretary of the Treasury, opposed this bill in its present form, and Secretary Glass took a decided opposition to the bill, as I shall set forth at length when I take the floor. But all three opposed this bill, particularly as to that feature granting this privilege to stockholders as well as depositors.

The gentleman says the only difference was that the stockholders were included.

Mr. EDMONDS. Stockholders and depositors. But I would like to state in answer to the gentleman, as I was going to say, that I investigated a case of a stockholder who had written me a letter. I found that this man had had left to him a few months before the failure of the bank five shares of stock. He had a manufacturing establishment, and he went around among his employees and collected $20,000 worth of subscriptions for Liberty loans, and having five shares of stock in this bank he put the subscriptions in the bank. It may be possible that the House may not want to decide upon paying the stockholders or the depositors, or reimbursing them for their losses in connection with this Liberty bond subscription. I do not know whether it is right or not, but I believe it can hardly be expected that any man who is a stockholder of a bank for two or three months, and never had any opportunity to understand the finances of the bank, could tell that that bank was in the condition that it was at the time of the failure.

Mr. STAFFORD. He had the privilege of examining the books of the bank at any time.

Mr. EDMONDS. He had, but he did not do it, and you would not have done it had you been such a stockholder.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is this the first bill that the committee has acted on with reference to the relief of Liberty loan purchasers?

Mr. EDMONDS. The first one of this kind. Is the gentleman thinking of the Kerrville bill, the Texas bill, that the President vetoed?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. What I am thinking of is the course the committee intends to pursue. They are all cases which excite our sympathy. For instance, in the district which I represent a bank had gotten the bonds and had not delivered them to the subscribers, when the bank building burned, and the subscribers never got the bonds. I took the matter up with the Treasury Department, and they said in that case there was no relief under the present law. I do not know that I had it up with the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think the Treasury Department has done that in all cases where there has been a fire and all evidence of the money has been destroyed, unless there could be something shown that the bonds had certain numbers or there was a record in regard to them.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes. If we go into the field of relieving people who have purchased bonds in good faith, and a great many of whom sacrificed in order to do it, how are we going to draw the line? These people who purchased the bonds there are just as deserving as those who purchased them in Philadelphia.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am not talking only for Philadelphia. Of course the cases are not similar at all. These people were subscribing a dollar a week. They were told by the central committee to put their money in the bank. The bank was an agency of the Government for that purpose. The result was that when the bank failed and the money had been embezzled by the officers of the bank these people had no place to go to. They have not any opportunity to get their money in any way, shape, or form.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman states that this bank was the agent of the United States Government. Is that accurate?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Or was this bank induced by the Government to purchase these bonds, become the owner of them, and transfer them to the other people?

Mr. EDMONDS. I do not know exactly how it was worked out. What happened was this: When a man would write to the central committee and tell that committee that he was willing to put up a dollar a week to take a $50 bond, they sent him a postal card to go to a certain bank.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The same thing occurred in the case I am talking about. Those people out there wanted to buy Liberty bonds in response to the urgent appeal that was made by the Government. The Liberty bonds were sold through the bank. Whether the technical title to the bonds went to the bank or from the bank to the actual purchaser I do not know. But they put their money in the hands of that bank because the United States Government through its Liberty loan campaign wanted them to do so. They never got the bonds. If one bank was the agent of the Government all the banks were, and these poor people out there have not gotten the bonds which they bought. Now, if we are going to relieve people who have not gotten, through some reason or other, the bonds which they purchased, because the delivering process was not good, ought we not to relieve them all?

Mr. EDMONDS. You are relieving all of this class of cases in this bill.

Mr. LEA of California. Under the bonding act the Treasury Department has made regulations, when bonds are burned up, such as you refer to, in case of the establishment of the fact of their being destroyed, to the effect that the department will issue other bonds. So that is taken care of at the present time without legislation. It is necessary to establish the fact.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. You must establish that fact. The facts in the case that I referred to do not come within their ruling.

Mr. HIMES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. HIMES. Is it not a fact that during the issuance of, I think it was the third Liberty loan, the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo at that time, issued a request through the press over his own signature to the effect that people should subscribe and make payments for their Liberty loans through the several banks?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes; and also their own banks. That would cover the case. He would be told to go to his own bank or to the nearest bank. The Secretary of the Treasury made that announcement several times through the newspapers.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not only that but the application blank had a line upon it on which the subscriber was requested to give the name of the bank through which he desired to purchase the bonds.

Mr. EDMONDS. That is right. I should say that, in my opinion, this bill covers all of those cases. Probably, if you came in contact with those people as much as I did, you would realize the propriety of this measure. I took a great deal of interest in the third Liberty loan. We had in Philadelphia what were known as honor flags for wards, and the first ward in the city that won an honor flag was Brewerytown, where a great many Germans live. That was my home ward.

I worked very hard to get it. People went to these banks, particularly in the residential section, because they were open certain nights in a week, and made their payments there. An incident happened to me where an old German woman, who could hardly talk English, came to my house and wanted to give me $5 on a $50 bond. I said to her, "How are you going to pay for the bond?" She said, "I will pay a dollar a week to you. I will come to you and pay it." I said, "You can go to the bank in your neighborhood and pay any amount of money you choose each week. They will be very glad to do it." That German woman may be one of these subscribers for all I know.

The people have complained to me from time to time that they went there on the credit of the Government to an agency of the Government and put their money in; that they put in $5 or $10 or $25 or $30 in the bank, and there is no chance to get it back. They were making these payments to the North Penn Bank.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Has the gentleman any accurate estimate of how much will be involved?

Mr. EDMONDS. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, covering 7,500 subscribers. The extreme estimated number would be covered by $250,000 for all the bonds that failed, and which are in the same situation as North Penn Bank.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Then why should not reimbursement be made for the loss of bonds where the subscriber failed to get the bonds from the bank? He is entitled to relief; and if he is entitled to relief in some cases he ought to be in others.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think where it can be absolutely proven that these agents of the Government caused a loss to the subscribers they ought to be relieved. In this case there is no question. In a case where the bonds were burned it is possible that you have only to take the statement of somebody that they were in the safe, and you know it is hard in the House here to try to reimburse a man who suffers loss under such circumstances as that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It is the same kind of a case. The subscriber paid his money and he did not get the bond.

Mr. EDMONDS. The bank is responsible for the money. In the case the gentleman mentions it is the bank that makes the loss. In this case it is the private party.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. But the bank is not responsible. The bank or the bank firm had their loss.

Mr. EDMONDS. Has the bank any assets at all? I imagine those people would get their portion of the assets.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. They never have gotten it.

Mr. EDMONDS. In this case, where you are paying partial subscribers to the bonds, it is not like the case where the bonds have been fully subscribed.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. You say the amount is definitely ascertainable?

Mr. EDMONDS. They say it is about $250,000.

Mr. LAYTON. The books are in existence as to the payments, so that the accurate amount can be ascertained?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. It is simply a case of the accounting officers going over the accounts and proving them.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. In the gentleman's colloquy with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] he spoke of the banks being agents of the Government. How far did that agency extend? I understand the organization was entirely voluntary, gotten up by the people themselves, originating, it is true, with the Treasury Department; but it was entirely voluntary and in no way connected with the Government officials. Am I right about that?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. Those committees were formed in the different cities. We formed a committee in my ward. That committee went around from door to door and took subscriptions. We turned them into the nearest bank. If we had sent them to the central committee, they would have simply sent them to the banks again.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The banks gathered those subscriptions in, whether State or national or private banks, and took these subscriptions?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Why are you justified in saying that they were the direct agents of the Government and therefore that the Government is responsible?

Mr. EDMONDS. The Government committees, appointed under the Treasury Department and at the request of the Treasury Department, would write these people postal cards and state that they could go to the banks.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That is, these voluntary committees did that?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. They were directed by the Treasury Department to do it, and the Treasury Department asked a number of different groups of bankers and business men to go on these committees and try to sell these bonds. They went out from door to door and from street to street selling these bonds.

Mr. LAYTON. Yes; and as a matter of fact the members of these committees went out on Sunday among the congregations in the churches and used that as an argument—that the banks were authorized by the Government to back up a $5 subscription on a $50 bond.

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes. They stated that they were asked to do that.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. That may be, but the work that was done was entirely voluntary. If you base your argument on the basis that these were Government agencies, I do not think you have a good case on the ground that this bank was an agent of the Government. If you base it on the ground of equity, it would probably show in a better way.

Mr. EDMONDS. I am willing to put it on any basis so that these people will get their money.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. Is it not a fact that the Treasury, even to-day, notifies the people through the newspapers that they can subscribe for these short-time certificates through their banks? And is it not a further fact that in the North Penn Bank, the case now under consideration, they took all the money that was placed in that bank and placed it in the general funds of the bank rather than set it aside as a trust fund with which to purchase the bonds of the Government?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The Government is not responsible for that, is it?

Mr. EDMONDS. That may be true. I do not know whether the money was placed in the funds of the bank; but, anyway, somebody took it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Even so, the Government is not responsible for that, is it?

Mr. ROSE. The Secretary of the Treasury even now asks you to go to your bank and subscribe for these short-time certificates. That was done in the case of the Liberty bonds, and the people were misled by that, and they went to the bank to subscribe their money just as they should have done. They showed a proper patriotic spirit and wanted to buy the bonds of the Government. Now, because they went to the banks with their money and the banks failed, we of this committee believe that the Government is at least indirectly responsible for the people paying their installment subscriptions to the banks. We feel that it was not the fault of the people who went to the banks and subscribed and paid in their money innocently and in good faith. The money subscribed was a small amount in each case, but in the aggregate it amounts to about a quarter of a million of dollars which was lost in this way.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will allow me, every bank as well as every individual was appealed to as a matter of patriotism to take part in this work, and the people were appealed to to subscribe to these Liberty loan bonds.

Mr. ROSE. We have seen advertisements published in the papers by various banks inviting people to come to the bank and subscribe for the bonds of the Government.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HUSTED. I do not think the banks were ever officially designated as agents of the Government in connection with the flotation of these Liberty loans, but people were encouraged to utilize the banks, and they were really led to believe that the banks were cooperating with the Government in the flotation of the loans and were in a sense agencies of the Government for that purpose. I think that fact alone is sufficient justification for the repayment to those people of the subscriptions that were lost through the failures of the banks.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS. Can the gentleman inform us what percentage of these claims are held by stockholders and what percentage by officers of these failed banks?

Mr. EDMONDS. Until an investigation is made it will be impossible to say. Personally I am willing to leave that to the House. If they want to pay the stockholders, or if they want to except the stockholders from being paid for their losses on these subscriptions to Liberty loan bonds I am perfectly willing to leave it to the House to decide, but I believe the depositors should be repaid. The officers and the directors are not allowed to collect under this bill. They were the men who were responsible for the operation of these banks, and they should not get any reimbursement; but when it comes to the stockholders and depositors, who were certainly innocent parties, absolutely without any opportunity of getting any knowledge of the status of the bank, it is a question whether we ought not to pay them. The committee think you ought to pay them.

Mr. EVANS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. EDMONDS. Certainly.

Mr. EVANS. Does not the gentleman personally think that the stockholders ought not to recover?

Mr. EDMONDS. I called attention to one case which I investigated, where a man had had five shares of stock left to him two or three months before the bank failed. He went out among his employees and collected subscriptions for $20,000 worth of bonds to be paid for in installments. He went up to the bank because he was a stockholder in the bank, and deposited the money at the bank. That money is gone. In that case would you want to prohibit that stockholder from being reimbursed?

The gentleman says that a stockholder has plenty of opportunity to go and investigate into the affairs of the bank, but how many of us would do it? If somebody left us five shares of bank stock and within two or three months the bank failed, how many of us would feel that we were in any way responsible for it?

Mr. HUSTED. I do not think the stockholders should be included.

Mr. EVANS. In the case the gentleman from Pennsylvania mentions the individuals from whom the stockholder collected subscriptions would be entitled to recover under this bill anyway, would they not?

Mr. EDMONDS. This particular concern at great loss to itself has reimbursed its employees.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman answer another question?

Mr. EDMONDS. If I can.

Mr. LAYTON. Do you propose in this bill to reimburse not only those who subscribed for Liberty bonds but those who lost their money as ordinary stockholders?

Mr. EDMONDS. Oh, no; only to the extent to which stockholders paid in money on their subscriptions to Liberty bonds—stockholders and depositors. That is a question that I am perfectly willing to leave to the House. It is the judgment of the Committee on Claims that the stockholders and depositors should be reimbursed. If you think the stockholders and depositors should not be reimbursed, all right. The relief I am asking for is for the poor fellow on the street, the man who was making only $15 or $20 a week, and who went and subscribed for a Liberty bond and paid in his little $1 a week, particularly our brewery men, who had no opportunity to make much money during the war.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. WURZBACH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 132. Joint resolution to provide for the continuance of certain Government publications.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN LIBERTY LOAN SUBSCRIBERS.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. LEA of California. I think I can give the gentleman some information in reply to the question he asks. The bank in California has a deficiency of about $38,000, of which amount $2,300 was paid on subscriptions by stockholders. The Pennsylvania bank is the principal one involved, and in that case there is a considerable amount that would go to the stockholders for this reason: It was a workingman's bank. The depositors were induced to become stockholders in the bank. It was a bank that remained open on Saturday night so that workingmen could go in and make their deposits and buy Liberty bonds. There were a large number of laboring men who held stock in this bank, usually one share apiece. They would be denied their money if the stockholders were cut out.

Another case, the largest stockholder in the Pennsylvania bank was a company that took over another company on its going out of business. The assets of the defunct concern included five shares of stock of the bank, which subsequently failed. Those shares were acquired incidentally in taking over the company. The newspapers announced there was a failure to secure the amount of Liberty bond subscriptions allotted to that district, and so this stockholder went down and made the largest subscription. The amount of stock he held had nothing to do with the actual management of the bank. Now, if you cut out the stockholders you will cut out the largest subscriber in this case who had no practical relation to the management of the bank.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA.]

Mr. LEA of California. Mr. Chairman, I desire to give a summary of this situation as it appears to me. As you all know, our whole country was called upon to subscribe for Liberty bonds. It turned out that in the case of five banks, and only five banks in the whole United States, subscribers failed to secure the bonds because the banks subsequently failed. The object of this bill is to indemnify these subscribers for the actual amount of money they paid into the banks. The whole amount will not exceed $254,000, and probably it will be several thousand less because in the case of one or two banks further dividends will slightly reduce the amount involved.

There are over 7,000 subscribers in these cases. There are over 6,000 subscribers in the one workingman's bank in Pennsylvania. The average amount paid in by the laboring man to that bank was less than $35. There are about 600 subscribers in the bank at Santa Rosa with a total amount of less than $38,000, which has not been repaid. The subscribers to the bank at Santa Rosa represent the class of people of very modest means in nearly every instance. The average amount of subscription there was less than $80.

Now, I want to give you some of the facts as to relation of these banks to the Government in the effort to get subscriptions to Liberty bonds. In the first place, the Liberty bond subscribers were informed that "applications must reach the Treasury Department, or some incorporated bank or trust company within the United States on or before" the close of business on a certain day. In the second place, notice was given to Liberty bond subscribers, and I have the notice here that was originally given to me, which reads as follows:

It is strongly recommended that subscribers avail themselves of the assistance of their own banks and trust companies, in which case they will of course make payments through such institutions. In cases where they do not do so, subscribers should make payment either to the Treasury Department in Washington or to one of the Federal reserve banks, etc.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Who signed that?

Mr. LEA of California. The Secretary of the Treasury. In other words, the Government specifically authorized subscribers to make payment through any one of three agencies—to the Treasury, the Federal reserve bank, or to his "own bank." In these cases the subscribers followed the instructions "strongly recommended" by the Secretary of the Treasury, and paid their money to their own bank. Then, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, after the subscription was sent in a post card was mailed out to the individual subscribers bearing the heading of the United States Treasury and signed by the United States Treasurer, reading as follows:

You are instructed to call at once upon the North Penn Bank in order to arrange to complete your subscription. The first payment must be made at once at the place above named. You will receive your button and window emblem when you make your first payment.

Now, it is suggested that these depositors and stockholders should not be included because they determine for themselves the solvency of this bank. Let us see what the facts are. The average shareholder and depositor in this case did not pay out of a surplus deposit but saved or borrowed the money and paid into the bank to meet his subscription. I know of one case where a man, the principal subscribing stockholder in the bank involved, in my own State, who owed $23,000, mortgaged his property on which he had recently constructed a business building. He was paying 6 per cent interest on this $23,000 mortgage and borrowed money to meet his subscription for Liberty bonds. He was a stockholder in this bank. He borrowed at 6 per cent to make this subscription out of which he was to get less than 4 per cent. That was a common case. In addition to that, this stockholder had to pay a 100 per cent assessment on all stock he owned in the bank. He had nothing to do with the practical management of the bank.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Did the Treasury Department recommend this bank that failed?

Mr LEA of California. It did.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is there anything to show that?

Mr. LEA of California. The regular inspections were made of these banks before they failed, and the usual certificates given of their solvency.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. By the Federal Government?

Mr. LEA of California. By the Federal Government in the case of the national bank and by the State inspectors in the case of the State banks.

Mr. HUSTED. What logical reason is there for including stockholders and excluding directors?

Mr. LEA of California. A director is a manager of the bank, while a stockholder simply buys the stock. For instance, take this laboring man in Pennsylvania. He bought a share of stock and he had nothing to do with the management of the bank any more than the gentleman or I.

Mr. HUSTED. At the time those subscriptions were taken, men who happened to be directors were directors of a solvent bank which had been certified as solvent by the Government, as the gentleman says.

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I fail to see any logical reason for excluding them and including the ordinary stockholder.

Mr. LEA of California. That may be so, but we concluded to yield to the suggestion of the Treasury on that point.

Mr. DUNBAR. Is it not often the case that the directors of a bank themselves control the election of the directors?

Mr. LEA of California. They do.

Mr. DUNBAR. And that the vote of a minority stockholder is absolutely of no consequence and would not avail even though he did vote.

Mr. LEA of California. I think that is so.

Mr. DUNBAR. And that in the election of directors the directors of the banks get a certain number of proxies from the stockholders, they being obtained by the largest stockholders in the bank—the men who control the bank—and that the minority stockholders are absolutely ignored.

Mr. LEA of California. That is a common practice in the country, of course. In other words, the director is ordinarily an active agent in the management of the bank, while the stockholder is not. In addition to that, these people who were depositors, these people who were stockholders, were specifically directed by the Treasury Department to pay this money through their own banks. It so happened that the bank in California was a United States depository, designated by the Treasury of the United States. The chairman of the Liberty loan committee was the cashier of the bank that failed, and the secretary of the Liberty loan committee was an employee in the bank that failed.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the only national bank which is involved in this case which had an inspection of the national-bank examiners. All of the others are State banks.

Mr. LEA of California. I believe that is true. I believe that substantially covers the point I had in mind.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] suggested that the rest were State banks. Does the gentleman from California know whether they were all State banks, or were there some private banks?

Mr. LEA of California. They were all incorporated banks.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Were they under State visitation or were some of them private banks? I know that there were banks in my own home town that were private banks. At that same time the State of Illinois did not have compulsory visitation or inspection of banks. Some of these may have been private banks, so far as I know.

Mr. LEA of California. I think not. So far as I know they were all subject to inspection. Certainly they were in California and Pennsylvania.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. There were many States in the Union where that is not so. I may say to the credit of my own State that since that time we have now State inspection of our banks, but we did not have at that time.

Mr. LEA of California. If there was no State inspection in any of these banks, it was in those banks where the amount involved here is very small.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEA of California. Yes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Has the gentleman any idea of what claims could be put forth by stockholders, but not directors?

Mr. LEA of California. So far as the Government is concerned?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. LEA of California. All the claim that they can urge here is the amount stated in the bill for the amount actually paid.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Has the gentleman any idea of what the amounts paid by these stockholders would aggregate?

Mr. LEA of California. I could not give the gentleman the exact figures. At the Santa Rosa Bank it would be about $2,300, and the amounts in Pennsylvania would be considerable because of the laboring men's subscriptions, and also because of that one case I mentioned where the party who made the largest subscription to the bank happened to own five shares of stock which had been taken over from another company which failed.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Is it proposed by this bill to reimburse the stockholders for the losses they sustained?

Mr. LEA of California. In these subscriptions; yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Does that include the stockholders who were directors of the bank, who were responsible for the management of the banks?

Mr. LEA of California. It does not. They are expressly excluded by the terms of the bill—directors and officers.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HIMES].

Mr. HIMES. Mr. Chairman, it is a privilege to be permitted to rise in behalf of the preservation of the integrity of our Government and in behalf of patriotic citizens who suffered losses by reason of their patriotism due to influences entirely beyond their control.

The bill before us does not attempt to fix such losses nor to establish the fact that losses were sustained. It merely would legalize a moral obligation and permit responsible Government representatives to inquire into, establish, and discharge our indebtedness under that obligation. It seeks only to have our Government recognize an actual agency as a legal one.

When we engaged in the World War the Government called for service both on the field of battle and in industrial and commercial life at home. "We must mobilize a Nation," said the President, and thank God the response was almost 100 per cent in the affirmative. When money was needed a collection agency had to be established and Government officials and the people generally decided upon and accepted the banking institutions throughout the country as nuclei for organization. The Government urged that people purchase bonds and directed that the purchases be made through local banks.

From every conceivable viewpoint the banks were the agents of the Government, and because of our great common need millions and billions of dollars were poured into these banks. Among the purchasers were hundreds and thousands of people who purchased through them as Government agents who had never entrusted their money to them as banking institutions.

The banks held themselves out, and very properly so, to be agents of the Government. The people generally accepted this representation in good faith and there was never, in so far as I have been advised, any repudiation by the Government of such representation. On the contrary, there was every reason to believe that it was acceptable and accepted.

I am more definitely interested in obtaining relief for the citizens in Mineral City, Ohio. This thriving little village is in the center of one of our prosperous agricultural and mining communities. During the war its quotas of young men and moneys were provided and the older men, the women, and children cheerfully substituted in the harvest field and in industry. At each call for funds the best citizens gave of their time in going from house to house and from farm to farm, even in the most severe weather, as salesmen of Government bonds. Several of these salesmen assured me that at no time did they have to use the space upon their papers provided for remarks as to why subscriptions were not made. Many of these subscriptions were only for $50 or $100. The citizens able so to do made purchases running up into thousands of dollars.

In every instance subscriptions were to be paid through the local bank. A trusted official of that bank defaulted. We do not know why, and probably will never know, because his life has been forfeited.

I have been assured that the ordinary precautions to prevent such occurrences had not been relaxed and that brother officials were as surprised and astonished as the most disinterested person in the village.

Reparation has been made in so far as has been possible, and we are only asking payment or consideration of payments for actual losses sustained.

This bill has my unqualified support, because it seeks only to render simple justice and to justify our continued pride in our national honor.

I feel that I would be wasting time to say anything further, because I can not but think that this measure will pass unanimously.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD].

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, on November 11, early in the morning, there will move from this Capitol Building toward Arlington Cemetery, one of the most solemn and impressive processions ever organized in the history of the Nation. It will be a part of the memorable tribute that this Nation and this people are paying to our unknown dead soldier from the battle fields of France.

Shrouded with the flag he died to save, escorted by living comrades who wear the badges of distinguished and immortal valor, reviewed by multitudes with bowed heads and grateful hearts, and "wrapped in the mantle of his people's praises," the prone and silent figure of this stalwart son of the Republic will pass upon his last review.

The tribute of a great Nation to one of its outstanding, distinguished, conspicious public men is always an impressive thing. But this will be a different ceremonial. The man in the casket will be unknown. He may have been of the city's culture, or a laborer of the mills who took off his overalls to put on his khaki, or a plowboy from Dixie's countryside or Western plain. That, with us and with him, counts little now. We are not memorializing his identity; we seek only with our tears, or our silence, or appropriate spoken word, to honor his faith, his sacrifice, his soul.

A stately and historic procession will follow him to the mounded silences of Arlington. We here will march with him. But, comrades of this legislative fellowship, I ask you on November 11, and thereafter too, will he march with us? Not in the flesh, of course, but will his spirit counsel with us—not only to remember him, but to take heed that he will have died in vain if the politicians and diplomats of the world continue to make possible for other men a corresponding fate? [Applause.]

I verily believe that he would be interred content, and with gratitude for his death, if he could only know that because he died war as a human institution likewise gave up the ghost. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask permission to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I feel impelled to rise in opposition to this bill. We have before us now 71 private bills which by the arrangement of the House are scheduled for passage to-day and to-morrow. Some of them involve enormous sums of money. Some of them are good bills and ought to be passed without argument or objection; some of them are bad bills and set bad precedents. I know just how we feel about raising objections to such bills. I know why we are deterred from rising in opposition to them. Let me mention some reasons that we have in mind. One is, "What is the use; why should we uselessly exert effort to stop them?" Take the bill we passed this morning on a record vote of 215 for it and 43 against it, a bill that involved $69,500 to be credited to a postmaster's account, which was against every precedent set up by our Government by its law and rules of the Post Office Department. There was an assistant postmaster responsible for this loss, concerning whose action no one will get up and deny that he was at least grossly negligent, and no lawyer will deny that his bond is an obligation due this Government and should be made to respond for part of this loss, and yet by our vote this morning of 215 to 43 we absolutely released him and his bondsmen. Not a dollar will ever be paid to this Government. So we are prone to say here "What is the use of effort?" There was some effort made against that bill, but what is the use of effort when with all these bills coming up we have 40 of our colleagues here to hear the argument and know what there is about the bill, and then when we come to vote upon it the balance come in and vote without knowing. So we ask ourselves, "What is the use of effort?" But I make the assertion that effort pays after all. Even if we lose temporarily, if we will fight these bills, sooner or later we will get the attention of our colleagues concerning them. Now, another reason. This bill, the chairman admits, involves $350,000——

Mr. EDMONDS. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. BLANTON. Two hundred and fifty thousand dollars on its face. That does not take into consideration the millions of dollars that will be involved from the precedent we set up by passing it. There are five of our colleagues directly interested in the passage of this bill. It involves numerous constituents of five of our colleagues in their respective districts.

We ask ourselves this question. If we get up and oppose the bill, we hurt the feelings of our five colleagues. They might take it as a personal feeling against them. They might not like us for the fight we make against their bill. They might hold it against us and some time when we have a bill they might buffet us and cause us to suffer thereby——

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. I will tell you how I feel about it by reciting my life's motto:

For what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently; but if, when you do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God.

That is from the Good Book, and that is my life's motto. If we do what we think we ought to do concerning these matters, our colleagues ought not to hold it against us.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a minute. I have only 10 minutes. Let us take this bill. Five banks fail. The depositors in those banks selected those institutions as the ones through whom they would buy their Liberty bonds. Every bond I was able to purchase during the war I had to go to my bank and borrow the money and pay 10 per cent during the war, and the bank carried me until I paid them out. Suppose I had selected a bad bank; should the Government reward me for using bad discretion and bad judgment? If when a man selects a bad institution to do business with, and he loses money thereby, and we let the Government come into the breach and make the loss good, then you place a premium upon the bad institutions of the country and you take away the credit from the good institutions. The bad banks of the country are practically placed upon a pedestal by our taking care of their depositors when they fail. This is a bad precedent we are setting; it is a precedent that is going to hound us hereafter; it is one that is liable to cost this Government millions of dollars. In an oil field county of my district not long ago there were four of the biggest banks that have done business, where men had several million dollars on deposit of people's funds; four of them failed in just a few weeks. How many of such accounts are in those banks? Are we going to set a precedent where the depositors may come in and claim that they have lost by reason of not having paid out their Liberty bond account and they should be reimbursed? I leave it to you, my colleagues, as business men of this country, whether you want to set this precedent. This bill ought not to pass. When it began it concerned only one bank, the bank in Pennsylvania, in the State where our colleague, Mr. EDMONDS, comes from. It has been growing all the time. Then the proposition was enlarged to take in another bank, then another one, one in California, one in North Dakota, one here and one there, and now we have five of them.

And when we pass the bill you are going to find others. The committee has not heard of them yet, but they will hear from them, because when you set this precedent it goes abroad and the people hear of it.

Mr. EDMONDS. I wish to say that all the reserve banks were asked for the information, and they all returned the information. This is not establishing a precedent. We have included all the banks.

Mr. BLANTON. Suppose from the big national banks—I think several of them were—that failed in Ranger, Tex., and when upon the setting of the sun on a certain day there was not a bank left to do business in that great city——

Mr. EDMONDS. They were private banks.

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). No; some national. Suppose the people had bought Liberty bonds from those four banks. You have not heard from them all. When you pass the bill it will set a precedent, and you will hear from them in the future.

Mr. HIMES. Does the gentleman think it is establishing a bad precedent for us to take care of these people, who in making these payments to the banks were helping to take care of the national welfare in time of great danger?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think—and I believe I have made as many sacrifices in buying Liberty bonds as any man according to means—I do not think an American citizen who stayed at home when there was fighting in France deserves a bit of credit for buying a bond during the war. It was their duty, and a man never deserves credit for doing his duty. When you do that which you should do you do not deserve credit for it. It is a business affair. We have put our money in banks during the war in connection with other enterprises. If we selected an institution that failed or that was not sound, it was our own lookout, and we should not come to our Government now after the war is closed and ask reimbursement.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I think I have eight minutes remaining, and I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL], a member of the committee.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, following the line of argument made by the gentleman from Texas the House might lose sight of the fact that you have a Committee on Claims; that this Committee on Claims, every member of it, is just as interested in preserving and taking care of the interests of the Government as any other Member of Congress. If the gentleman from Texas and other Members of the House could sit in this committee week after week and hear the members of the committee discuss the merits and demerits of proposed legislation, they would realize that there is not a committee in the House that is as "hard boiled" as the Committee on Claims. There is not a member who is influenced by sob stuff; there is not a member who is influenced by friendship or prestige of prominent officeholders; there is not a member whose sword knows a brother; but they are seeking justice and merit, particularly justice, in all of these claims which come before them.

It would be small on the part of Congress, it is rather small, although the intention may be good, for any Member of Congress to deny justice to the citizens of the country. It is too bad we have not a better vehicle for giving justice to the people. The United States Government can not be sued, and consequently all people who have their property destroyed, or who are injured, are obliged to come to Congress and to the Committee on Claims and ask for justice.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERHILL. I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman make some reply, since I could not get the opportunity, because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would not yield, to the suggestion that anyone who differs with his view on this bill or on the other bill that passed this morning is derelict in his duty to this House?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Chairman, I have no quarrel with the gentleman from Texas, and I give him credit for being sincere in taking a stand in opposition to some of these bills, but he has not heard the evidence. He perhaps loses sight of the fact that this particular bill provides for the relief of 7,500 citizens of this country who have tried to do their duty, as he expresses it, and have done their share of that duty. Now, they have through negligence, possibly of the Government itself, failed to receive what they had every right to believe, from all the information they had at the time from the press, from the platform, and from the pulpit, what they would receive, a promise to pay on the part of the Government. There were many who bought Liberty bonds who also gave money freely for other purposes. We had the privilege of giving that money, but when we bought these bonds we bought them as a business proposition and the Government offered them as such. But I believe most of these people bought them as a patriotic duty, and it seemed to the members of the committee that it was wrong to penalize these men for the failure of the governmental agency. The committee establishes no precedent. They first took a precaution to communicate with the Treasury Department and found that these five banks were the only ones in the whole United States that had failed in their obligations, failed in their moral obligations as well as their financial obligations, and that the total amount involved was $250,000. What is $250,000 compared to the good name of the United States Government and to the good will of 7,500 of its citizens and their innumerable friends and neighbors? [Applause.]

I am just as jealous of the Treasury and am just as careful of the expenditures of the money of the people as any Member in the House. I think my votes may show that I lean over backward in that regard, but when a measure of this character is presented to the committee, and the committee gives hours and hours of study to the proposition and takes the precaution of being advised by the Treasury Department, I think they are fully as competent to judge of the merits of the question as any Member who may have convictions, but who has not the advantage of the information. We are not asking for the relief of the bad banks in the country. They have been eliminated. But we are asking in this bill the Members of Congress to perform an act of justice to 7,500 people who in good faith purchased Liberty bonds at the suggestion, at the advice, almost upon the command, of the Government itself, and placed their money in institutions which, although it did not guarantee legally, the Government gave the impression that they were acting as its agents, and consequently the Government is morally responsible for their acts. No Member of Congress can possibly be troubled with conscientious scruples when he votes for a bill such as this.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to detract one iota from the excellent work, the sacrificing work, performed by the members of the Committee on Claims in their thankless task of considering and sifting the many, many bills that come before that committee. I wish to compliment not only the chairman but the other members of the committee for doing the very good work that they have done in the reporting of many good bills on the calendar. But that does not deter me and I have no apology to make for rising in opposition to their report in this case, when I cite that my position is supported by the three last Secretaries of the Treasury. I think the Members of the House will agree that there is good ground for the position that Secretary Houston, Secretary GLASS, and Secretary Mellon took in stating that this preferential right should not be extended to the depositors and stockholders of those banks.

And why did they take that position? And why do I think that their position is well taken? Because when a depositor or stockholder does business with a bank, he must be presumed to know the character of the bank.

The burden that is laid down by the proponents of this measure is that the Government invited the public to choose these banks as their agency. Now, Secretary GLASS denied that there is any such legal obligation existing between the Government and these respective agencies which performed this work. They were no more agents of the Government than the various men who enlisted voluntarily in the work of soliciting subscriptions for the Liberty loan drive; no more agents of the Government, no more holding out as agents of the Government—yes, less holding out as agents of the Government—than when the national banks place upon their windows the legend "National depository." Certainly the Secretaries of the Treasury did not assume the obligation and did not intend to create the impression that the people were to be guaranteed in their dealings with these State banks and national banks for all moneys deposited with them, either privately or arising out of their deposits, in payment of subscriptions.

Like every other Member of this House, I subscribed for bonds in one of the loan drives through one of the banks of my neighborhood. I subscribed also through that bank for some members of the family. I knew when I entered that subscription that if that bond for which I paid that money to the bank was not ultimately transferred to me I would be the loser, and I would have no recourse against the National Government; and I was not a depositor in that bank, either. I did it as a matter of convenience.

It is one thing to look upon this question as a matter of justice to the many poor people who had no idea whatsoever of the standing of the banks and return to them the amount of their subscription, and there is another policy to reimburse and guarantee stockholders and depositors of the failed bank for a transaction with that bank. That is what you are doing when you pay back these funds to those who were depositors and stockholders.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman, in giving instances of how these bonds were sold, recalls to my mind a specific instance which inclines me to vote for this bill. Some of the bonds were sold on the installment plan. If I recollect correctly, you paid 10 per cent cash, and then at a subsequent period you paid 35 per cent, and then still at another subsequent period you paid 35 per cent more, and then in the final payment you paid the balance and got your bond. I made my subscriptions through the home banks in that way. I understood my money was being handled in that way; but I do not know. Now, suppose I had paid 60 per cent and the bank had gone insolvent, and I found that none of that money had reached the Government. I would have felt that I ought to get the bond if the Government was conducting the business in that way.

The Government floated immense bond issues without any commission being paid. It was enabled to do that by these banks acting as agents for it in just such subscriptions as I myself and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] made, who did not have the money to pay outright with cash for these bonds. Many people had to subscribe for them on the installment plan. I am inclined to think that the Government could very well afford in these cases to make good the comparatively few losses.

Mr. STAFFORD. There the gentleman takes issue with me; that is where I take issue fundamentally with the position of the gentleman. I think that where you or any other person was a depositor with that bank and subscribed for these bonds through that bank so far as that deposit was concerned you should take the same degree of responsibility that you would with your other deposits; that the Government should not be held as the guarantor.

It is true that the Government can stand the loss. But the Government had no inspection over those State banks. The National Government and the Secretary of the Treasury would never have thought of making those banks their special representatives in collecting the funds. It was never attempted that way. It was an individual transaction.

I agree with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK] that so far as concerns the innocent persons cited by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS], who were appealed to to subscribe in small installments, the Government is big enough, especially in these patriotic drives, to return to them the amounts they paid to the failed bank. But just because some one subscribed through a bank and obtained a loan through the bank of 60 per cent and the bank fails there is no more reason why, because he subscribed for Government bonds, he should be exempted from the loss incident to the failure of the bank than that he should be exempted from loss in any other transaction with the bank.

What does Secretary Glass say on this matter? In his letter of June 28, 1919, he uses this language:

> There can be no doubt under the Liberty bond acts and the Treasury Department circulars offering the Liberty loans for subscription that subscription for Liberty bonds and Victory notes filed with incorporated banks and trust companies and not actually transmitted to the Federal reserve banks constituted merely private contracts between subscribers and the bank or trust company concerned. Subscribers have always been free to choose the bank or trust company through which to enter their subscriptions, and banks and trust companies receiving subscriptions have acted as subscribers' agencies, the only official agencies being the several Federal reserve banks and the Treasury Department. The United States is clearly not responsible on subscriptions filed with such subscribers' agencies, nor for payments thereon, and can not legally be made to answer for losses incurred in case of the default or failure of the subscribers' agency bank or trust company.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin understand that the Government designated these banks and directed depositors to place these funds in these banks?

Mr. STAFFORD. No more than the Government requested large numbers of persons to aid in obtaining subscriptions in the Liberty loan drives.

Mr. PARKS of Arkansas. Does not the evidence show that the Government named these specific banks?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the Government did not name them. They just issued a general circular stating that subscriptions could be made through banks as a matter of convenience for the subscribers, not as an agency of the Government, but just merely as a matter of convenience. Instead of depositing the money for the bonds in my local State bank in my neighborhood, which was a matter of convenience, if I had wanted to do so, I could have deposited it in the Federal reserve banks. That was a matter of convenience to me.

Mr. LEA of California. In this case specific post cards were directed to the subscribers telling them to go to this bank——

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. After they had designated the bank.

Mr. STAFFORD. As suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM], after the subscribers had designated that bank as their agency to receive their subscriptions.

Mr. LEA of California. After they had turned in their subscriptions; yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. After they had turned in their subscriptions. Yes; after I had subscribed through the local State bank and paid the full amount of my subscription, I received a notice from the Treasury Department that I could secure my bond from that bank. That bank was acting as my agent.

Mr. CLOUSE. This question occurred to me in the course of the gentleman's discussion of this matter: If a State or private bank undertook to act as an agent, whether voluntarily or for a consideration, would not that bank be liable to the Government and subject to criminal prosecution for a fraudulent breach of trust in the event that it failed to return to the Government the exact sum of money that it collected for these Liberty bonds?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I say positively that the National Government would have no legal claim whatsoever against those State banks for the return of money received from subscribers for the bonds. Nor has the Government attempted to reach those funds except in the case of national banks. In the case of the national banks, as the report shows, the Federal reserve banks have been advised to give these claims a preferred standing.

Mr. CLOUSE. I do not know whether the gentleman caught the full import of my question or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Perhaps not.

Mr. CLOUSE. If the United States Treasury designated a certain bank or depository as an agency or a means by which the bonds might be placed in the hands of the ultimate purchasers and that bank had accepted payment on those bonds, why would not that agent of the United States Government be liable to a criminal prosecution in the event that it converted the funds to some purpose other than that specifically designated by the United States Treasury?

Mr. STAFFORD. According to my understanding of the facts the Government did not create this bank its agent. The bank was the agent of the subscriber and merely a conduit through which the funds flowed. If the Government had designated, as the gentleman says, these banks to accept payment on these bonds, the question would arise whether the relation was that of a general creditor or a beneficiary of a trust fund.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, the Government sent you a notice to go to that bank and get your bonds?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. That created an agency.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; it did not create an agency. It was merely a notice that the bond was there, because I had created that bank my agent. The bank was my agent, and by reason of my subscription there was an implied or actual notice to the Government that that bank was my representative in this transaction, but it was not the agent of the Government.

Mr. EDMONDS. The Government virtually notified you that that bank was its agent.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; only that my agent had received the bond for which I had subscribed through that bank.

Mr. EDMONDS. It did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; it did.

Mr. EDMONDS. No; it said, "Go to this bank and get some bond."

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman made a distinction between national banks and State banks. Does the gentleman understand that the national banks were agents of the Government in this matter?

Mr. STAFFORD. They were no more agents of the National Government than State banks were, so Secretary GLASS says.

Mr. WINGO. What was the distinction that the gentleman was seeking to make between national banks and State banks?

Mr. STAFFORD. None at all, except that as far as national banks are concerned—let me see just what the Secretary's statement was.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman made a distinction between national banks and State banks on the question of this obligation. I did not catch that distinction which the gentleman made.

Mr. LEA of California. It was a question whether it would be treated as a general question or special question.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; the gentleman from California answered that.

Mr. WINGO. Does the gentleman know whether these State banks were member banks?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not think it is claimed that these State banks were member banks. They were small banks, and there is nothing in the report to show that they were member banks.

Mr. WINGO. What was the capital stock?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is not stated. The largest bank was the North Penn Bank, a State bank at Philadelphia, where the loss was $165,000.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman understands that member banks, with the approval of the Federal reserve banks, frequently acted as agents both in procuring rediscounts and also in another capacity for banks not member banks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes; in my State some State banks are member banks of the Federal reserve system. The argument has been advanced that in the flotation of certificates of indebtedness, which the Government is issuing from time to time in sums of hundreds of millions of dollars, that these certificates of indebtedness occupy the same relation, or the banks occupy the same relation to these certificates of indebtedness, as characterize their relation in the distribution of these bonds. The relation is largely the same.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows that these bonds were apportioned out by the Federal reserve banks to the districts in the same way that the Government's certificates are apportioned out, and each one is supposed to take care of his apportionment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Following out that logic, when I go to a member bank and subscribe for $1,000 United States certificate of indebtedness, one of these issues that recurs every month, or thereabouts, and the bank fails because of the embezzlement or misdeed of some officer, then on the ground that the national Government has held that bank out as an agent or has requested the bank to subscribe for a certain amount, I am privileged to seek recourse, not as an ordinary creditor of that State bank, or member bank, with which I do business, but I shall have the right to come to Congress and say—and that is the danger of this precedent so far as depositors and stockholders are concerned—I have the right to come here and say, gentlemen, the National Government in the flotation of a loan of $600,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness has parceled out to the respective Federal reserve districts, and to the respective banks in the district these certificates for sale, and because I subscribed through my local member bank for $1,000, and paid that bank my money and it failed, I have recourse against the National Government for $1,000.

Mr. EDMONDS. Let me say to the gentleman that a bank in my city the other day said they had some certificates of indebtedness to sell and wanted to sell me some. Now, who were they selling them for, themselves or the United States Government?

Mr. STAFFORD. They were selling them for themselves, of course; there is no question about that. The argument has been made that that is an analogous case, that the relationship is the same in the flotation of these certificates of indebtedness as in the case of Liberty bonds.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman says that the Federal system forces these bonds on the banks and the banks force them on their customers.

Mr. STAFFORD. Whether they are forced on them or not, when I subscribe for $1,000 of the United States certificates of indebtedness through a member bank and that bank fails, it is my loss, because I chose that bank with which to do business, and I have no recourse against the National Government.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let us assume that you go to your bank and subscribe for a Federal farm-loan bond or bonds of the War Finance Corporation, and while you are waiting for them, after you pay your money, the bank fails. Are we going to be asked to pay them?

Mr. STAFFORD. It is the same principle. Just before I came down here I had a small amount of idle money and a flotation was about to be made of five or six hundred million dollars in United States certificates of indebtedness. I left the money in the bank, took their receipt for its investment for that purpose. If the bank had failed before they received the certificates of indebtedness it would have been my loss, because I chose that bank as my agent to do that business.

Mr. STEPHENS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS. Does the Government have any agents through which they could conduct the business of disposing of Liberty bonds?

Mr. STAFFORD. The Federal reserve banks and the Subtreasury.

Mr. STEPHENS. They would be the only agents? Did the State banks have authority from the Government to dispose of Liberty bonds?

Mr. STAFFORD. No; the Treasury never undertook to give authority to the State banks in the country to dispose of bonds belonging to the Government.

Mr. STEPHENS. By what authority did the banks act in selling and distributing these Liberty bonds and collecting the money for them?

Mr. STAFFORD. The banks acted in the same relationship as they would in selling other bonds, but without any pay for their work, just the same as thousands of persons who were identified with the loan drive exerted themselves in their patriotic duty to see that the loans were fully subscribed.

Mr. Chairman, I think I have shown sufficient reason to create in the minds of Members here a doubt at least, and I hope a conviction, that we should not go to the extent of relieving depositors and stockholders. I have some milk of human kindness in my heart also, and I have no objection as a matter of charity to returning the funds to poor persons who subscribed through these banks who can not afford to take the loss in a governmental undertaking, but where they were depositors doing business with the banks in the usual course of trade they assumed full responsibility for that undertaking and should not be relieved of their loss. There should be no distinction between their current account and a portion of it diverted for the special purpose of purchasing Government bonds.

Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HUSTED].

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe there is any legal obligation on the part of the Government to return this money. The banks were not officially designated as the agents of the Government, but I think there is just as much moral obligation to return this money to those subscribers at least who are not depositors and stockholders of the bank as there would be to make good subscriptions that were paid directly to a Federal reserve bank or to the United States Treasury. I can not see any distinction. I happened to be the president of a small country bank while these Liberty loans were being floated. The people of the country were told by the Government that they could pay in any one of three ways, either to the banks, the Federal reserve banks, or to the Federal Treasury. The Government certainly acted in such a way as to lead the people who subscribed for these bonds to believe that the banks were authorized depositories for the purpose of receiving these subscriptions, and I have no doubt as a result of my own personal experience that many of these poor subscribers believed just that thing. They considered that the banks were cooperating with the Government in the flotation of these loans, and they were. The Government could not have put these loans over in the way it did without the cooperation of the local banks. It would not have gotten the subscribers, and it could not have sold the bonds in such large quantities. The quotas were apportional among the banks, and the banks were told to dispose of that amount of bonds. They sent their representatives around among the people. They had their representatives present at Liberty loan meetings. They were there, ready to receive the subscriptions of the people. They even kept the banks open for that very purpose long after regular banking hours, and all of this was in a way sanctioned by the National Government. I think it would be most unfair and unjust to permit a poor depositor who placed his funds in these banks under the direction of the Federal Government to stand the loss. I think these subscriptions should be held just as sacred and should be protected just as much by the Federal Government as though they had been deposited with the Federal reserve banks or with the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, it appears that there are $250,000 due to the people who subscribed for Liberty bonds through banks which afterwards failed. It is now proposed that the Government should become responsible for the repayment of these subscriptions to those who made applications for the bonds through the banks, which banks they themselves chose. It seems to me to be a dangerous precedent to establish. The Government was not responsible for the banks selected by the subscribers. That was a voluntary matter on their part. They could subscribe through any channel they might see fit to choose.

Mr. EDMONDS. The central committees in the large cities sent to the people postal cards telling them to go to these banks.

Mr. MADDEN. Who told them to do that?

Mr. EDMONDS. The central committees.

Mr. MADDEN. The central committees were doing just what the gentleman and I and everyone else was doing, working up a state of enthusiasm in order to have the people buy bonds.

Mr. EDMONDS. And we were mighty glad to do it and have the people do it.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I know, and it was patriotic on the part of these people to subscribe, but in choosing their own agencies through which to buy the bonds, they should be held responsible for their own action. It is not fair to the Treasury of the United States or to the rest of the people of the United States to say, whenever any person by some indirect method sought to purchase a Government security, that because of the fact that it is a Government security, if the agent chosen fails to turn the money over to the Government, therefore the Government itself must make up the loss. It must be admitted on every hand that these banks were organized under the State laws. They are all State banks, as I understand it, except one. They were institutions organized for profit. They were glad to act as the agents of any activity that would yield a profit, and they were in this instance inviting depositors to buy bonds that the United States was issuing through them, so that they might, if not then, later have a clientele which would enable them to make a still greater profit. If they failed in the performance of their duty as agents of the would-be purchasers and the money which they took in on deposit to be paid afterwards to the Treasury of the United States for the bonds proposed to be purchased by those who made the deposit was not paid to the Government, then they alone should be held accountable. The fact that they failed, but can not be held accountable because of that failure, does not justify the enactment of a law to recompense those whose funds were deposited, even though those funds were originally deposited with the expectation of helping the Government of the United States.

If we are to go on with this class of legislation, who knows where it may end, and who knows whether under this act, if it should become a law, the very officers and directors who caused the failure of the bank may not be the recipients of the favor of this reimbursement?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The provisions of the bill exempt the officers and directors from its benefits. What would the gentleman think with reference to stockholders?

Mr. MADDEN. Every stockholder in any of these banks, I assume, under the laws of the States under which they were organized would be responsible for double the amount of his stock. The question arises whether, if they were compelled to pay an assessment, there would be any loss for the Government to make up.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Just one minute more.

Mr. STAFFORD. I will yield two minutes additional to the gentleman.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MADDEN. I do.

Mr. EDMONDS. Of course, the stockholders of these banks have paid double their stock, but unfortunately the State courts have decided that this was simply a trust fund, and of course you could not use the trust funds of the bank to pay anybody's loss.

Mr. MADDEN. Well, I think, being a trust fund, it is more sacred to have in its possession a trust fund than would be the mere obligation of a deposit. But I do not know anything about the law; I am not a lawyer, but the ordinary common sense of the situation, it seems to me, would justify a compulsion on the part of the stockholders and the directors and the officers of the bank first to reimburse those people who made this patriotic deposit for the purpose of helping the Government in its time of need, but it does not follow that because that was not done that the Treasury of the United States ought to be compelled to meet the obligation. On the contrary, I think that everybody not affected in these particular deposits—stockholders, trustees, officers—ought to wait for whatever dividends may come to them out of the wreck after the banks are compelled to pay the people who deposited the money for a given purpose, and particularly since that given purpose was one in which the whole people of the United States were interested; but in any case I do not see how by any stretch of imagination any committee of the House could work itself into a state of mind to recommend the Treasury as the instrumentality to make the reimbursement. Mr. Chairman, I hope this bill will not pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOX].

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, first I want to refer to the work of the Committee on Claims. It is probable that no member of that committee sought a place there. I did not. It is a hard-worked committee, but it has proven that it measured up to the best standard in the sense of responsibility under which its members work. Personally I often feel they are rather severe in trimming and rejecting claims, and when I hear the work of that committee discussed in this House as if it were the work of a bunch of men trying to filch money out of the Treasury of the United States on unjust claims, I feel that the Members of this House engaging in that kind of talk are doing an injustice to their colleagues. I do not mean that every gentleman opposing this bill has done that, but it is often easier to fight just measures and then pretend that the objector or opponent of them is saving money than it is to accept the responsibility of doing right in a course not usually so popular with the unthinking. As to this particular claim, so far as I know no man interested in it lives within 500 miles of my home or any of my constituents or is akin to me or any of them. These people who bought bonds through these Government agencies did it largely at the instance of the Government. Those of us who cooperated with the activities of the Government in selling those bonds brought to bear every possible pressure to induce the people to go to these banks. If the purchasers had been eager for bonds and had sought the banks and prevailed on them to procure the bonds for them, that would be a different state of facts. The people, or a great many of them, and especially these small purchasers who are in the main to be relieved by this measure, were often inactive or somewhat unconcerned. You and I and many patriotic men and women of this country went out and coaxed those people, almost herded them often, into the banks to buy the bonds, telling them that was the place to go, that the Government had placed the bonds there for sale. The Government had written those people, the prospective subscribers, strongly recommending to them that they deal with the banks. I read the same language read by the gentleman from California [Mr. LEA].

It is strongly recommended that subscribers avail themselves of the assistance of their own banks and trust companies, in which case they will, of course, make payment through such instruments.

Make payments to whom and through whom? Make payments to the Government through these agencies designated by the Government. If I should say to one of my colleagues here, "I want you to pay a certain amount to another gentleman for me," I would feel obligated to recognize the payment thus made. Mr. Chairman, the Government of the United States is not legally liable on any of these claims, but the very fact that it is protected by its sovereign power makes it the more imperative that the dictates of honesty and good faith govern all of its actions. The Government was reaching down to the smallest hamlet in this country. It organized and used every available agency. The people were systematically induced to go to those banks and purchase their bonds through them. The average man and woman to be relieved by this measure had them, and now has no finespun idea about whose agent the bank was. He or she knows that his neighbor, the chairman of the Liberty bond drive, the judge of the court, his physician, the business man with whom he had often advised, told him that the bank was selling these bonds for the Government. The Government told him it strongly recommended that he go there and buy. It told him that he should make his payments to it through that bank. He has done it. He has acted in good faith, and the Government has caused him to place his money there. It is not the case of a man reaching out and causing the banks to deal with the Government for him. It is the case of the Government causing the banks to deal with the people for it. The Government assumed the burden of action, took the initiative, and acted affirmatively to induce him to make payment to the banks, charging itself with the moral responsibility for the consequences of that act.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman desire more time?

Mr. BOX. Yes; five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought I had 16 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk informs the Chair that the gentleman is correct, it is 16 minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. MADDEN. If the Government recognized these banks as agents, why did not the Government then compel the Government agents to turn the money into the Treasury of the United States daily on its receipt?

Mr. BOX. The Government was acting in time of peril. The Government dealt hastily, but it got all the money except one-fourth of one of the several thousand millions it caused to be paid to the banks. It dealt with 105,000,000 or 110,000,000 people; it dealt through some 30,000 fiscal agents. And be it said to the credit of the 30,000 banks selected by the Government as its agents to pass its securities to the people, that only five have been derelict, and that vindicates the action of the Government.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Was it not a fact that the Treasury was at fault in the delivery of its securities? That is, they did not have the bonds to deliver?

Mr. BOX. Their delivery was delayed under circumstances over which nobody had control, but the delay may have contributed to some of these losses.

Mr. LANHAM. And was it not also a matter peculiarly between the Government and the bank by which the purchasing bondholders could get them? My colleague is correct. The whole transaction between the Government and the bank was unknown to the average man. He did not know how the Government and the bank were handling the business between them. He only knew that his Government told him to pay his money to the bank. Shall he suffer now because he was trustful and obedient?

Mr. BOX. The bond buyer was urged by ardent patriotism. He heard our words on the stump. He was told to go to the bank to get his bond. He went and found it there. He found a notice from the Treasury of the United States telling him to go there and make his payments. This is not time for narrow hairsplitting in connection with a proposition like this. This is not a case of a man selecting a depository in which to carry his funds. It is a question of the Government making good a loss which it caused. It is the Government recognizing the agency to which it delegated to do this important work.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOX. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. If these banks which received the funds were agents of the Government, why did not the Government then present a claim against the trustees or receivers for these funds?

Mr. BOX. I am unable to tell the gentleman whether it did or not, nor do I wish to go into the nice technical distinctions about the law of agency under the facts bearing upon the relations between the Government and the banks as they understood their relations as between themselves. The purchaser only knows that he was told to deal with the bank. I am not engaged in that.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am not engaged in hairsplitting. I am engaged with the fundamental principle of what was the relationship between the banks and the Government.

Mr. BOX. The Government of the United States through the American Congress is now proposing to recognize the obligations arising from its course and here make good.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STAFFORD. How much time does the gentleman yield back?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin has 10 minutes remaining.

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO].

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, the question that confronts the committee is not one of legal obligation. Of course no lawyer would contend you can, in this matter, establish a legal agency or legal liability of the Government. If that were true, the claimants would be in a different forum, and not appealing to the conscience of the House of Representatives. It is a question for the committee to decide, first, whether or not there is a moral obligation, and whether, as a matter of public policy, we ought to recognize that moral obligation. As I have said here before, I am more careful of my moral obligations than of my legal obligations. A legal obligation can be enforced in a court of law, but the only court in which a moral obligation can be pressed is in the court of conscience and honor.

Now, gentlemen, in determining this, we should take into consideration the conditions that existed and all the facts. It is a fact that you can not dispute that the Secretary of the Treasury had the authority to constitute the whole Federal reserve system his floating agency in the flotation of these bonds. He did it. And the Federal reserve banks did not undertake to limit the work to the member banks, but they called on every bank, and they organized in every city and State throughout this land a working force, organized by the Treasury, with a head in each State, and each State had a head in each county. And the men the Government sent out told the people that the banks were the agency that the Government was going to use. And you and I went on the stump and appealed to them, and told them to go down to the bank, and that bank went out, not for profit——

Mr. MCFADDEN. And they were also directed to go to any bank—their own bank.

Mr. WINGO. They were directed to go to any bank. We went out on the stump and told them to do it. Why tell me that these banks were not held out as agents of the United States Government? They used them for the purpose. Now, when some man suffers a legal loss for which he is not responsible, but an agency of the Government, we had better be careful before we repudiate that moral obligation. We are not out of the woods yet in financing this war. The Secretary of the Treasury has my sympathy. In the next few years we must do considerable financing. If you begin by dealing with the citizens of the United States at arm's length, it will have a bad effect in the future. Gentlemen, we used these agencies in a time of great need. We made the drive, and public officials like Members of Congress went up and down their districts telling them to go in here and go in there and sign up a subscription. If you had told them to subscribe directly to the Treasury 99 per cent would not have known how to do it, and therefore the Treasury established its own agency in order to get in touch with the people. The Treasury got the benefit of it. The $250,000 we will lose in this transaction was saved many times over in floating this great bond issue by the use of these agencies.

Mr. CLOUSE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the United States Treasury made these depositories its agents in these transactions?

Mr. WINGO. I think they did morally. There was not a legal obligation. But we held them out to the public as the proper place to go to subscribe. I do not know what the gentleman did, but I stood on every stump in my district and in every town, in the Liberty loan drive, and I appealed to patriotic sentiments to make the slackers go up and subscribe. And they drove them up, to what? To what in the mind of the people was the agency of the United States Government, the nearest bank.

And we made them subscribe, either through force of public opinion or by appealing to the natural patriotic sentiment of every patriotic man. We used these agencies. It is splitting hairs, it is quibbling, to say that they were not morally agents of the Government.

Mr. CLOUSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. WINGO. Yes.

Mr. CLOUSE. I will ask the gentleman if it is not true that most of the bonds that were consumed by the public were first sold to the banks, and that the banks in turn sold them to purchasers throughout the country?

Mr. WINGO. No; I do not think so. Many patriotic banks, although they were put to great loss and were not compensated, when they saw their country going to fall down, said, "We will take the quota and put them out," and they got them out, and unfortunately many of them had a lot of liquid assets tied up in those long-time bonds. I think a great deal can be said on that point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, listening to this discussion, my mind goes back to those stirring days of the Liberty loan drives. We did not then stand on technicalities. We did not then stand on fine points. In the territory where I live we went from house to house to solicit these subscriptions, and upon the blanks themselves on the very first line, as I recollect it, a space in which the purchaser, the subscriber, was required to designate the bank through which he proposed to buy the bonds.

I do not want the attitude of the Treasury Department to be misunderstood upon this bill. Secretary Mellon, in a letter dated May 31, 1921, addressed to the Chairman of the Committee on Claims, says:

> I have given careful consideration to the matter of affording relief as proposed and find myself in entire agreement with the views expressed by my predecessors, Secretary Glass and Secretary Houston, with reference to House bill 13542—a similar bill in the Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.

What was the attitude of Secretary Glass? I will read it. You will find it on page 6 of the committee report. He says:

> The Treasury feels, however, that the United States, while not responsible for the losses which subscribers have suffered, would be justified in paying them within certain limitations, as expenses incidental to the flotation of the Liberty loans, and would, therefore, interpose no objection to, but would rather look with sympathy upon, legislation providing for each specific case substantially along the following lines.

Then Secretary Glass, who, it must be remembered, was the gentleman who handled this proposition during the war——

A MEMBER. No; Secretary McAdoo.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; of course, it was first Secretary McAdoo, but Secretary Glass was his successor and a Member of this House.

Mr. STAFFORD. And he handled the Victory loan as Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; he handled the Victory loan. He proceeds to outline a bill which is substantially in conformity with the bill here proposed, except that he recommends, in addition to the officers and directors, that the depositors and stockholders shall not receive the benefits of the bill.

For myself, Mr. Chairman, I shall support an amendment eliminating the stockholders from any relief from this bill. So far as depositors are concerned, I can see no reason why a depositor in a bank should not have the same benefits under this bill as any other citizen who made his subscription for bonds through a bank. What does the depositor know about the solvency of his bank? What does the depositor have to do with the management or with the operation of the bank in which he deposits his money? We all know that in many cases he is at the mercy of the bank in which he has a deposit. But I think it is fair to eliminate the stockholders along with the officers and directors.

I agree perfectly with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO]. I am not prepared to say that there was any legal liability on the part of the Government with respect to the funds deposited with the banks by the purchasers of bonds; in fact, my own opinion is that there was no legal liability. But we certainly went out, representing the Government of the United States, urging the people to buy these Liberty bonds and urging the people to make their subscriptions through the banks.

The people did not all go to the banks in my community. We went to the homes of the people. We importuned them and sought their subscriptions, and they signed on the dotted line. Sometimes they themselves put in the name of the bank, and sometimes the solicitor put it in. In my organization, the Patriotic League of the Twenty-sixth Ward, of Chicago, very frequently thousands of applications would come in with no bank designated at all, and we would fill in the name of the bank, because we had orders from the headquarters down in the city, in the Federal reserve bank, that some bank should be designated. We frequently designated, of course, the Federal reserve bank, but as a matter of local pride we usually designated some bank in the immediate neighborhood.

I think we should carry out the spirit of the activities of the war by giving this relief. I am surprised, and I am very much pleased to note, that the obligations on this account do not exceed more than a quarter of a million dollars, out of the billions and billions of Liberty bonds that were sold to the people during the war by these methods. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be read. I believe that all the time has expired now.

The CHAIRMAN. One minute remains. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the accounting officers of the Treasury Department be, and are hereby, authorized and directed to receive, examine, and determine the claims of Liberty loan subscribers for losses suffered by them by reason of payments on Liberty bond purchases made through the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio; Robbinsdale State Bank, Robbinsdale, Minn.; and Farmers and Merchants State Bank, Kenmare, N. Dak., for which bonds were not delivered on account of the failure of said banks, and to determine the amount of losses actually suffered by each claimant, not exceeding the amount paid by them, less all sums paid or to be paid said claimant upon the liquidation of said banks.
> SEC. 2. That the amount of the loss actually suffered as so ascertained and determined shall be certified by said accounting officers to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall pay the same to said claimants out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated. Said accounting officers may also, before the final liquidation of said banks, whenever they can determine the approximate amount to be paid to claimants hereunder, certify the same to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon have power to pay claimant such sum, upon the claimant assigning to the said Secretary for the benefit of the United States all interest he may have in any additional sum which may become payable to such claimant from said banks or the receiver thereof on account of his payment for such Liberty bonds: Provided, however, That no payment hereunder shall be given to any claimant found to be a director or officer of the failed banks at the time he became a subscriber for such bonds.
> The Secretary of the Treasury shall have no power to act upon any claim hereunder not presented within six months after the passage of this act.

With a committee amendment:

> Amend the title so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Liberty loan subscribers of the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; and Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio; Robbinsdale State Bank, Robbinsdale, Minn.; and Farmers and Merchants State Bank, Kenmare, N. Dak."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Page 2, line 24, after the word "director," insert a comma and the following words: "stockholder, depositor."

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think this is a sufficiently important amendment to warrant the calling of a quorum. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes the point of no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Seventy-four Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, found itself without a quorum; whereupon he caused the roll to be called, when 231 Members answered to their names, a quorum; and he reported the names of the absentees to be printed in the Journal and RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The committee will resume its session.

Accordingly the committee resumed its session, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois had the floor when the point of no quorum was made.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let the amendment of the gentleman be read again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: On page 2, in line 24, after the word "director," insert a comma and the following words: "Stockholder, depositor."

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, for the benefit of those who have not heard all of the arguments this afternoon let me state briefly that this is a bill to reimburse certain persons who had subscribed for Liberty bonds in five banks situated in five States of the Union, which banks failed before the parties received their bonds.

The aggregate amount of liabilities as stated by members of the committee is about $254,000.

This matter has been up on several occasions, as I take it, before the successive Secretaries of the Treasury, Mr. Houston, Mr. Glass, and again before Mr. Mellon, as to the limit or responsibility of the Government in this matter, if there is any responsibility at all, and the question has been discussed in correspondence with them. Some of this correspondence is set out in the RECORD, and I will refer to it in what I have to say.

My amendment seeks to exempt from the benefits of this act stockholders and depositors of the defunct banks. The bill as drawn exempts officers and directors. I would like to add to that exemption stockholders and depositors.

I am advised that not only the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], but the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] will offer amendments to this amendment of mine perhaps striking out the word "depositors" and leaving the word "stockholders," so that the House will ultimately have its choice as to whether it desires to exclude depositors and stockholders or either of those classes.

In the first place, I want to call attention to the letter of Secretary Mellon, which is found on page 4 of the report. I will quote just a little of it. It is dated May 31 of this year, written to Mr. EDMONDS. He says:

I have given careful consideration to the matter of affording relief as proposed and find myself in entire agreement with the views expressed by my predecessors, Secretary Glass and Secretary Houston, with reference to House bill 13542, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session.

Now, I call attention to the letter of Secretary Houston, and what he said about the particular matter that is involved in my amendment. He says:

I note that H. R. 13542 meets the views of the Treasury in part, in that it proposes to deny relief to subscribers who were directors or officers of the failed bank, but I feel strongly that the same principle should be applied to subscribers who were depositors or stockholders, and relief denied to them.

Now, listen to his reason. I think it is very good:

Stockholders and depositors, like officers and directors, were engaged in business relations with the failed bank entirely independent of their Liberty loan subscriptions and may reasonably be expected to have satisfied themselves as to its responsibility and solvency, so that no obligation, legal or moral, rests upon the United States to justify the granting of relief.

The members of the committee will remember that no one has contended seriously here that there is any legal obligation on the part of the United States to repay these amounts that have been thus lost, but it has been contended by the proponents of this measure that there is a moral obligation. If there is a moral obligation, gentlemen, that moral obligation does not rest against the Government in cases where the person was voluntarily doing business with the bank and designated the bank with which he ordinarily did business.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I am quite with the gentleman as to the stockholders, but as to the depositors I am not with him. The stockholders were responsible. They ought not to be reimbursed.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I think perhaps our minds are in accord. The stockholders were responsible. They were, so to speak, a part of the officers of these banks. They were helping transact the business of the banks, and they ought to be charged with notice.

Mr. CANNON. If the bank failed, they had to help make good.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; I think we are agreed on that idea. It certainly ought to be true that the stockholders of the bank ought not to receive any benefits of this bill, because they were a part of the machinery that did this business.

Now, I agree with the Secretary of the Treasury that there ought to be no relief to the depositors, the people who were customarily doing business with the bank, because they knew the bank, they voluntarily chose it, carried on transactions with it, and the Liberty bond subscriptions were no different from their ordinary deposits in relation to the confidence which they reposed in the bank.

Mr. DOWELL. A stockholder, of course, is presumed to know something about the inside workings of the bank, and he helps to elect the officers of the bank. But the depositor has no such knowledge. He is given no information with reference to the inside workings of the bank. How can the gentleman say that a mere depositor was given notice of the inside workings of the bank?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Here is the distinction, if there is any. I will admit the force of what the gentleman says; but suppose you pick out a bank in your town to do business with.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

By unanimous consent, the time of Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois was extended five minutes.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Where you go to a bank in your town to do business you are presumed to know something about the business relationship of the bank, its financial responsibility, its general condition, and how can you make a distinction fairly between the business of the depositors in purchasing bonds and in doing ordinary business with the bank?

Mr. DOWELL. Is there any distinction between the man who lives in the neighborhood and does not happen to have a deposit in the bank and the man who does happen to have a deposit in the bank? Should we by legislation discriminate between the two in this manner?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes; there is quite a difference. The difference is this: In the one case where the person deposits he has to satisfy his own mind about the safety of his deposit or he would not put his money there.

Mr. DOWELL. Possibly that is true, but that does not create any sort of an obligation on him to have any information relative to the condition of the bank.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Let me say a word now and then I will yield further to the gentleman. Now, that statement I have made from Secretary Houston was also made by Secretary Glass. Let me read what he said:

I notice also that the bill as drawn would permit relief to subscribers who were depositors in the failed bank. As indicated in my letter of June 28 to Congressman LEA, I feel that depositors, like officers, directors, and stockholders of the bank, were engaged in business relations with the bank entirely independent of their Liberty loan subscriptions, and may reasonably be expected to have satisfied themselves as to its responsibility and solvency, so that there is no obligation, legal or moral, resting upon the United States to justify the granting of relief.

Secretary Glass in another letter, written later, dated June 28 last, reiterates the same proposition, and again in another letter on December 16 he reiterates the same proposition.

Three Secretaries of the Treasury—Secretary Houston, Secretary Glass, Secretary Mellon—have all recommended that the stockholders and depositors be excluded from the benefits of this act, and yet the committee has excluded neither class. Whatever this committee does, whether it accepts the substitute, whether it includes both depositors and stockholders, it is manifest that the Claims Committee has not followed the advice of the three Secretaries of the Treasury in that particular, the failure to do so being a fact which may cause the United States to lose many, many thousands of dollars.

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Each bank was under the same method of supervision, either State or National examiners. When the examiner had gone in and examined a bank once or twice, as the law provides, and given it a clean bill of health, had not the depositor the right to rely on that examination? He had no way of telling whether the bank was about to break or not. The stockholder had no way of telling. The directors of a bank are in a room without the presence of the stockholders and go through with their business. I have been one for 25 years. Why should even the stockholder be barred when he had no way of knowing whether the bank was solvent or not, to say nothing of the depositors?

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. The stockholder of any bank has the right to look at the bank's books. If he has not that right, then the laws are vitally and seriously defective. That is the law in my State, and I suspect it is in the gentleman's State.

Mr. MILLSPAUGH. Then they are defective in my State, because he has not that right and he would not know anything about it if he had. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. I insist that any stockholder in any bank in the country ought not to be permitted to take advantage of his wrong where he in part himself is responsible for the transaction.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM to the amendment offered by Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois: Strike out of the amendment the word "depositors."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, the theory upon which this legislation proceeds has been repeatedly stated in the discussion. It is that the Government itself—indirectly at least—made the banks agents of the Government for the sale of Liberty bonds. From that point of view it will be conceded at once that there is no difference in the position or situation of an officer or director or of a stockholder or depositor of a bank. But from my point of view there was a difference in the business conducted by these classes of people with particular banks. The officers, directors, and stockholders are managers of the bank, and they are responsible for the operations of the bank, and they know the financial condition of the bank. I think they come with very poor grace asking that they shall be exempt from the loss sustained through the bank over which they had control and management. The depositor has no such control or management. In fact, the depositor is himself at the mercy of the directors and stockholders and those who manage the bank. He knows nothing about the solvency of his bank. He went to his bank to buy Liberty bonds, because the Government had told him to go to a bank.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. BEGG. I should like to have the gentleman make clear the distinction in respect to the obligation of the Government for the loss, providing the man was paying on a Liberty bond in this bank or was making deposits regularly there. To be specific, if he is putting in $25 a week and the bank should fail he would lose it. If he is putting in $25 a week to pay on a Liberty bond and the bank failed——

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I think I understand the gentleman's question. If he was depositing $25 a week in the bank on his own account, he did that of his own volition and for his own business. If he was putting $1 or $2 or $10 into the bank in the form of payment on Liberty bonds which he had purchased, he did that because the Government directed him to purchase his bonds through the bank and make his payment through the bank.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman has missed my question. I am not talking about the man who was not a regular depositor. I am talking about the regular depositor who is in the habit of putting so much money a week or a month into the bank, but who, because the Government needed Liberty bonds purchased, consents to put a partial amount of his deposit into Liberty bonds. Where is the moral obligation of the Government to refund to him when, if he had not bought the Liberty bonds and he had deposited the money as he was doing regularly, he would have lost it anyhow, in the case of the failure of the bank?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. It does not follow at all that he would have put that same amount in the bank.

Mr. BEGG. It does with the regular depositor.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The fact is that the people for whom I am speaking, the people with whom I came in contact in the sale of Liberty bonds, were people who would have very little money ordinarily to deposit in a bank. They might have run a little business or they might have put a little money in a savings bank. The gentleman speaks of depositors. Does he mean commercial or savings bank depositors? A savings bank depositor certainly would not be in the same position as a commercial depositor. The man who puts his money into the bank as a depositor for his business does it for his own convenience. He does not do that by direction of the Government, or at the request of the Government; but if that same man buys Liberty bonds and deposits his money in the bank to be paid over to the Government, he is doing that at the request of the Government, and he is at least in his own consciousness and in his own intention using the agency suggested to him by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. ROSE. I want to bring to the mind of the gentleman the fact that in every one of these deposits about which we are arguing there was not a single case that shows that the money was deposited for the purchase of bonds, but the cashiers of the banks took all of the money and deposited it in the treasury of the bank. That is where the mistake has been made all the way through. When you come to take out these men who were depositors, where are you going to end? Would not nearly everybody say that he deposited the money for the purchase of bonds?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The purchasers of bonds will have the receipts for the payments which they made. I do not think we are concerned now with the method of making proof; that is a practical question. I think, however, there is a vital difference between the depositor and the stockholder.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. Is it not a matter of fact in actual practice that these men who bought Liberty bonds deposited them with the banks and the banks kept a separate account with reference to the purchase of the Liberty bonds?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I presume they did. They should have done it. I do not know whether it was done in all cases.

Mr. ROSE. In no case that came before the committee was that fact ascertained.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I submit to the committee that the purpose of my amendment is to differentiate between the depositor who has nothing to do with the management of the bank and the stockholder, who, at least, has something to do with it and who is presumed to be to some extent responsible for the conduct of the institution in which he has an interest.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to both of these amendments. We are going to try if we can to return to the people who on installments, in most cases, subscribed for Liberty bonds and who were unfortunate enough to have placed the funds for those bonds in banks that afterwards failed. The question comes up as to why you should reimburse the depositor. In Philadelphia it was simply a neighborhood bank. The bank was formed about 10 years before the time of the failure. The depositors were small storekeepers and housekeepers in the neighborhood. They knew nothing about the bank. It was a matter of convenience, and nothing more, to them. Take the case of the stockholders. When the bank was formed they sent solicitors around to the little storekeepers and housekeepers, who bought one or two shares of stock in the bank. They knew nothing about the conduct of the bank. Had they gone to the bank and tried to find out whether the bank was in default they could not have done it. It took some of the most expert accountants possible to get hold of and decipher what those men had done with the money that they had taken.

No small stockholder could possibly in any way have found out if he had investigated the affairs of the bank. You all know how these banks are conducted, particularly these small neighborhood banks. They are conducted by a group of men in the neighborhood. While I do not believe we should reimburse any officer or director of a bank, I do not see how in good conscience we can refuse to pay the stockholders and depositors in the bank. Another thing: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], I think, remarked that some of these people would probably get some reimbursement. There is no possibility of finding any State court that will in any way acknowledge the responsibility of these State banks toward subscriptions to the Liberty loan fund.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman will permit, I do not think I made such a statement.

Mr. EDMONDS. Perhaps it was the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM]. These men took this money and put it in some kind of a fund. Fortunately they kept account of it, probably expecting something would turn up and they would be able to repay it; they were caught in their embezzlement and they were arrested and put in jail. There is no way of collecting this money from anybody, excepting from these men. If they had the money possibly these people who paid it to them could go and collect it. But I can not see how in good conscience we can return this money to one person and not to the other person. If it were true that any man was a heavy stockholder in the bank possibly he would go and investigate the affairs of the bank. He possibly would be a director; he might be an officer.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. WILLIAMSON. Has the gentleman any information as to what proportion of this amount would go to the stockholders?

Mr. EDMONDS. Indeed I have not, and I could not make such a statement. Until investigation is made by the Treasury Department it would be impossible to tell. I am a little bit afraid that in most of those local banks, and they were local banks, you will find a great many of them were stockholders in the bank. I trust the House will pass the bill as it came from the committee. We have studied this question thoroughly.

Mr. McPHERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. EDMONDS. I will.

Mr. McPHERSON. If I understand the transaction, whether he was a stockholder or whether he was not, whether he was a depositor or whether he was not, each of these claimants had been led to believe that when he put his money into the hands of the officers of these banks that he was making payment on his bonds?

Mr. EDMONDS. Most surely.

Mr. McPHERSON. He was not making a deposit, he did not understand that he was depositing money in the bank, but making the payment of a dollar a week to the Government of the United States by paying it to the Government's agent.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman's contention is absolutely correct.

Mr. McPHERSON. Would not the gentleman think it is just as morally due to the stockholder as to the depositor?

Mr. EDMONDS. I think so.

Mr. McPHERSON. Or a person who had no relation——

Mr. EDMONDS. I sent people to this bank myself whom I do not think were stockholders. They went and paid the dollar a week thinking they were paying it to the United States Government. As a matter of fact, we folks who went out and asked for subscriptions on these bonds thought they were paying it to the Government, and you know it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, or whatever is necessary to get the floor. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to talk for just a minute in the interest of the stockholder. I think this bill is all right as written. I am opposed to these amendments. When the Government asked the bank to handle and sell these bonds during the war the bankers were compelled under public sentiment and war stress to sell them. Now, the stockholder of the banks who elects certain officials under the law of some States is responsible for his agent's action, but in this particular case this was a duty which the stockholder had nothing to do with putting upon those officials. Every stockholder of the bank, perhaps, might have been opposed to his bank handling those bonds, but it was a duty that devolved upon the officials of the bank as patriotic citizens. Now, the official who has thus assumed those responsibilities and undertakes to perform this duty for the Government becomes the agent of the Government, but in no sense in the performance of this particular service can you say that he is the agent of the stockholder. No fair Government would thus impose upon the innocent stockholder.

The banks were not established as State banks for this purpose, nor were national banks established for this purpose. This was an extraordinary duty placed on the officials of the bank, and in view of the fact that they performed their duty, whether the stockholders desired it or not, this stockholder goes and buys a $50 or a $100 bond under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, who tells him in the tons of literature sent over the country to induce citizens to buy bonds and thus save the Government, and told him to pay part on it and that the bank would hold the bond and at the end of the payment time, when he shall have paid for it, he would get his bond.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I have not the time.

Mr. BEGG. I will ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Mississippi be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BEGG. The question I am asking is really for information. It is not to bother you. It is as to this matter of agency. South America, or Brazil, to be specific, sold an 8 per cent bond issue in the United States a few weeks ago. I happened to be connected with a bank. Suppose that bank undertook to sell $100,000 worth of those to the citizens in my town, and John Smith came in and bought $1,000 worth of them and said that he was going to pay for them at the rate of $25 at a time; then after he has paid, say, $50, our bank breaks dishonestly; is Brazil responsible, morally or legally?

Mr. SISSON. I will tell you how I differentiate between the two cases. I may be wrong, but it is my view of the matter. When a bank buys foreign securities or bonds and is authorized under its charter to do that, that is a part of the bank's business. In this particular case the stockholder got nothing for this service, it was not the bank's business; it was service the officer of the bank was compelled to render as an official of the bank by the war orders of the Government. The stockholder got no benefit. But when the bank's charter permits the dealing in these bonds as a part of its business and for profit the stockholder is responsible. In the cases covered in this bill that was not true. As I was saying a moment ago, you gentlemen recollect the tons of literature that was sent out during the war and put into the hands of everybody to induce them to buy bonds. It was even sent to the banks and your banker sent it out to the stockholders of his bank and to every depositor of the bank. And they put on these drives to sell bonds. A fellow would come in and say, "I have no money in the bank," when he would be told, "Here is the literature. The Government tells you after you subscribe for these bonds the bank will carry them for you and you pay what you can; in such cases the bank becomes the agency of the Government." And I say the stockholder himself could not have prevented this. I doubt if the Government would have permitted the stockholders to have controlled the situation, because the Government virtually took the banks by the throat and said, "You have got to absorb that much security." I do not want banks in the future, when Uncle Sam is in trouble, to rise up and say, "No, sir; I will not transact any more business for Uncle Sam, because you can not trust him. We did what you said, and yet because this bank failed, you let me lose my money. He was your agent, not mine." Therefore, I think the stockholders ought to be protected. [Applause.]

Most if not all these cases were poor men who had to make a sacrifice to make the partial payment and it would be little less than a crime to make him suffer on account of the dishonesty of the Government agents. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. It is already ended. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. How does it follow that all debate on the section is closed?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. That motion is in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moved that debate on the section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The question was taken and the amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. GRAHAM, and the amendment to that amendment by the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. CHINDBLOM, will be again reported.

The amendments were again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The CHAIRMAN. As many as are in favor of the amendment will rise and stand until counted.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw that request.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAHAM] as amended.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 30, noes 77.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bills back to the House with favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves that the committee do now rise and report the several bills back to the House, one with an amendment and one without amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bills as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House, reported that that committee, having under consideration bills on the Private Calendar, had directed him to report back to the House two bills, one with an amendment and one without amendment, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to, and that the bills as amended do pass.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, is it parliamentary to move the previous question on both bills?

The SPEAKER. No. That must be done separately.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN LOUISIANA.

Mr. EDMONDS. Then I move the previous question on the bill H. R. 2866.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 2866) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and patent to parties named herein certain lands in Louisiana.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion for the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN LIBERTY LOAN SUBSCRIBERS.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill H. R. 5775.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5775) for the relief of Liberty loan subscribers of the North Penn Bank, of Philadelphia, Pa.; Santa Rosa National Bank, Santa Rosa, Calif.; and Mineral City Bank, Mineral City, Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves to recommit the bill. The Clerk will report the motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GRAHAM of Illinois moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Claims, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment: Insert the word "stockholder" after the word "director," in line 24, page 2.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDMONDS. If the House were to adjourn now, would this bill be up to-morrow morning, the previous question having been ordered?

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects that by unanimous consent it was agreed that to-morrow nothing should be taken up except bills unobjected to.

Mr. EDMONDS. Then I move the previous question.

Mr. WINGO. That was fixing the general order of business.

The SPEAKER. Of course, it would regularly come up on claims day.

Mr. WINGO. This bill belongs to a general class.

Mr. MONDELL. If the previous question were ordered, if there were not a special order, the bill would be the unfinished business to-morrow?

The SPEAKER. It would not.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the special agreement interfere with the consideration of a bill which is the unfinished business?

The SPEAKER. The agreement or order was that bills on the Private Calendar to which no objection is made should be in order for consideration on Saturday. The Chair thinks this bill would be in order to-morrow.

Mr. WINGO. That simply makes them in order. That does not exclude anything else. They all belong to the same general class.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the previous question has been ordered on the bill to final passage.

The SPEAKER. Not on the motion to recommit.

Mr. EDMONDS. I think I moved the previous question. I move the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the previous question on the motion to recommit.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote whereby, on page 126, the amendment incorporating section 258 was agreed to be reconsidered.

Mr. McCUMBER. There is no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin that the vote by which section 258, on page 126, was adopted be reconsidered? The Chair hears none, and the vote is reconsidered. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I offer the following amendment to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 126, line 13, before the word "That" it is proposed to insert the letter "a" inclosed in parentheses; and on page 126, after line 20, to insert three new subdivisions, as follows:

(b) Every person owning (1) any obligations of a State, Territory, or any political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia; or (2) securities issued under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act of July 17, 1916; or (3) the obligations of the United States or its possessions; or (4) bonds issued by the War Finance Corporation shall, in the return required by this title, submit a statement showing the number and amount of such obligations, securities, and bonds owned by him and the income received therefrom, in such form and with such information as the commissioner may require.

(c) The commissioner shall make a report to Congress on the first day of each regular session, showing in detail the aggregate amount of such obligations, securities, and bonds held by taxpayers, and the interest received therefrom, classified (under rules and regulations prescribed by the commissioner with the approval of the Secretary) according to (1) the character of the obligations, securities, and bonds, and (2) the net incomes of the taxpayers.

(d) If any person fails to comply with the provisions of subdivision (b) there shall be added as part of the tax, in addition to all other penalties provided by law, a penalty of 5 per cent of the amount of the tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think everyone recognizes the fact that tax-exempt securities, not only those issued by the Federal Government but those issued by the State governments and by the municipalities within the State governments, afford a shelter to wealth from taxation. We are asked to reduce the surtaxes on incomes paying more than $66,000 a year to the fortunate possessors of those incomes, because, as it was said again and again, the taxation of wealth to the amount named in the existing law as applicable to incomes of $66,000 a year and more led the owners of such incomes to invest in tax-exempt securities in order to escape such taxation.

Mr. President, it is a fundamental principle of any just system of taxation that wealth shall pay its proportionate share of the burdens of government. The fact that the Federal Government and various State governments have issued these tax-exempt securities affords wealth an opportunity to escape paying its just share by making its investments in securities that are free from taxation under existing law. The object of this amendment is to enable us to determine for statistical purposes the amount of these tax-exempt securities. There has been a good deal of speculation as to the volume of tax-exempt securities in this country. The amount of such securities has been variously stated as $14,000,000,000 and as $18,000,000,000, and some estimates place the total at $20,000,000,000. It has been said in the course of this debate that tax-exempt securities are being issued at a rate approaching $1,000,000,000 a year. Surely, if taxes in support of the Government are to be based upon the principle that the owner of wealth shall bear his proportionate share, there must be some check upon the opportunities to invest in tax-exempt securities, and at least we ought to know what is being done in that regard. The purpose of this amendment is simply to inform us of the facts.

It is proposed by the amendment which I have offered that every person owning tax-exempt securities in making his income-tax return shall list his securities that are exempt from taxation. The amendment further provides that it shall be the duty of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to report to Congress those who have invested their accumulations in that class of securities. It seems to me that that is a wholesome provision. I believe that the country is entitled to know what citizens are bearing the burdens of taxation and those who are escaping their just share of the burdens of taxation.

The Treasury experts inform me that compliance with this amendment will not be too great an undertaking for the Treasury Department. It will impose some additional labor upon the Government. These returns will be called for upon a separate slip, they will be returned separately, and those returns can be easily classified. I believe that for every consideration this amendment ought to be adopted, and I ask for a vote upon it.

I do not wish to prolong the discussion. I ask for a vote upon the amendment and for a roll call upon it, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee, upon which the yeas and nays have been requested.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which section 257, page 125, was agreed to be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With that section pending before the Senate, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 125, strike out lines 2 to 25, both inclusive, and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 126, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 257. That when the returns of any person shall be made as provided in this title, the returns, together with any correction thereof which may have been made by the commissioner, shall be filed in the Treasury Department, and shall constitute public records and be open to inspection as such under the same rules and regulations as govern the inspection of public records generally.

On page 126, line 10, after the word "addresses," insert "and amount of income," so as to make the paragraph read:

The commissioner shall as soon as practicable in each year cause to be prepared and made available to public inspection in such manner as he may determine, in the office of the collector in each internal-revenue district and in such other places as he may determine, lists containing the names and the post-office addresses and amount of income of all individuals making income-tax returns in such district.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The two amendments really ought to be considered together, and I think it will save time if they may be considered as one amendment, and without objection I ask that that order be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. MCCUMBER. I have no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The purpose of these two amendments, Mr. President, is to insure publicity with respect to all returns regarding taxation. I believe, sir, that absolute open publicity is a cardinal principle to which we must adhere if democracy is to be perpetuated. That principle is one which is generally regarded as a fundamental in practically all of the affairs pertaining to our Government. We print a CONGRESSIONAL RECORD here day by day, because the people of this country have a right to know how they are being served by their representatives.

Mr. President, we have a general statute that all the records of the Government shall be public records, and it is only as that statute has been modified in the interest of particular individuals and particular classes that we have forsaken the principle of publicity with regard to tax returns made to the Federal Government. In nearly every State we find written upon the statute books that the records of the State government shall be open to public inspection; but, Mr. President, for some reason or other, in somebody's interest, we have hedged about the returns on taxes provisions of secrecy with regard to those returns.

In whose interest has that been done? What underlies it? What is it for? Why is it that there is written into the statutes a provision that no one may learn what the tax returns of the owners of great incomes are unless he obtain a special permit from the President? There can be no reason for it, Senators, excepting the purpose to shelter tax dodgers. Never was a deadlier blow struck at the life of real democracy than the insertion of a provision into our statutes that taxpayers should be shielded and protected in tax evasions. That is all those provisions are for. They can have no other purpose.

Let me say to Senators here to-day that they do not serve even interest of property when they stand by provisions of that sort in the law, for I maintain that the security of property rests upon property bearing its fair share of taxation. Mr. President, it requires no argument to prove that statement; it is written large in the long history of the struggle with wealth to make it pay its just share of the burdens of government.

My friend from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] thinks that this bill is a bill to "soak the rich." This bill, as I view it, Mr. President, will untax wealth and exempt the rich from taxation.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. MOSES. I think I have said in the Senate that the bill was drawn under the inspiration of the alluring slogan "soak the rich," and if it has failed in its purpose, it is not my fault.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let my friend from New Hampshire possess his soul in peace. It does not fail of its purpose. When we began framing revenue legislation to meet the obligations imposed upon this Government by war, we began to write into that legislation provisions which allow wealth to escape its fair share of the tax burden.

Take any of the provisions with respect to deductions, and trace them through the laws of 1917 and 1918 down to the provisions of this law, and there will be found a constant effort toward enlargement of the exemptions and the deductions. They multiply again and again. These particular sections contain some curious provisions. I have on my desk an analysis of this bill prepared by a tax expert, taking up one after another 47 different pages of this bill in which side doors are opened through which wealth slips this way and that way to evade meeting its obligations.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, of course the Senator is well aware that that is the fault of all legislation that is drawn upon the theory which has accompanied the framing of this bill. Whenever legislation of any kind is drawn to permit an exempted class any privileges the pressure always is to enlarge the circle.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Absolutely.

Mr. MOSES. It is not unique in this measure. It is the fault of legislation of that character.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is not unique in this particular, if the Senator will permit an interruption, excepting that from 1917 down to this time the ingenuity of man in devising ways to enlarge the opportunities for exemption and exceptions seems to have gone to the limit.

Mr. MOSES. If the Senator will permit me further, is it the Senator's contention that under the amendment he is now discussing the exposure of tax returns will result in an improvement of the situation through the pressure of public opinion, or does he think that by inspection individuals in some manner may begin an action, or does he think that there will be an accumulated body of facts upon which remedial legislation may be based?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is my belief that it is a fundamental proposition of government that all matters pertaining to the Government should be open to the inspection of the public, and I believe that when applied to tax returns it will work a very great reform, in spite of the provisions which have been written into the tax laws by Congress making the way easier for wealth to escape its share of taxation. I do not just at this moment remember whether the Senator from New Hampshire was here when we passed the tax law of 1918, as it is called.

Mr. MOSES. I was.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Then the Senator will remember that there were a large number of provisions in that bill which were called "cushion provisions." They were worked out with a view of making it easy for wealth.

Mr. MOSES. Is the Senator now maintaining that those cushions have been enlarged in the present bill to feather-bed size?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Indeed they have. There has been no restriction; there has been further enlargement of the gaps through which wealth may escape the taxing power of the Government.

Mr. MOSES. May I ask the Senator another question? In the event of the adoption of the Senator's amendment are we not going to find an inspection of these records made constantly by mere seekers after information, curiosity mongers who will want to inspect the records for no other purpose than to find out how much property his neighbor has?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It may be possible. There may be something in that, but I think every man has a right to know what his neighbor pays in the way of taxes. I think that is fundamental if we are to have the principle adhered to of supporting Government equal in that each man shall support the Government in proportion to his ability to pay. I do not think we can leave it to the individual to say whether he is doing his part or not. We tried that in my own State. We allowed the railroads to assess themselves from 1854 down to about 1903 or 1904, when we succeeded in getting some change in that legislation. We allowed them under a license system to fix the amount they would return for taxation. They did it under oath, it is true, but there grew up a general belief that they were not making an honest return and an investigation was made. I do not mean to impugn the motives of a railroad executive making his returns any more than men can generally be brought under criticism when the thing is done in secret.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Pardon me just a moment, and I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

It was found that the most exemplary presidents of railroad companies of Wisconsin were committing perjury once a year in making their tax returns. Legislation was passed permitting an inspection of their books, and it was shown that they had covered up their taxes and had not honestly returned them. Thereafter we forced them into settlement, so that they paid large sums of money into the treasury of the State.

Mr. President, I repeat, we can not leave these matters to the individual conscience of the taxpayer. I do not pretend to explain the psychology that governs this situation. I am not here to say that wealth is a crime and that poverty is a virtue, but I am just here to say that human nature is human nature, and you can not leave it to men to say what their taxes shall be.

Why, sirs, we have built up under this system of taxation since the war came on a science for evading taxation. The responsibility for this wrong rests with Congress. We offered them the opportunity; we opened the way. We wrote into the tax bill these cushion provisions, these trapdoor provisions, these side chutes through which wealth to the sum of hundreds and hundreds of millions of dollars escaped taxation.

I beg the Senator's pardon. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. I wish to suggest to the Senator that under the tax laws of many of the States individuals are required to present on a particular date the property which may be assessed against them and upon which taxes are levied against them. In those assessment blanks the law requires the taxpayer to present a list of all his property. He files that blank in the assessor's office. I am speaking of some of the systems of taxation in vogue. Those assessment forms, containing a statement in detail of the taxpayer's property, are matters of public record open to the inspection of anybody. Now, if that is so in the States, upon what theory do we make a different rule in the Nation?

A wag said the other day, though, of course, I would not dare subscribe to any such thing, that the title of the pending bill ought to be changed to read "An act to permit the dishonest to cheat the Government." That may be in line with what has been suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think every Senator upon the floor familiar with the provisions of law of his own State will bear out the statement of the Senator from California, former governor of his State. And, as he suggests, this proposition does not contain any new or startling principle. Many States have recognized the justice of making the returns upon property a matter of public record. It is high time that the Federal Government should recognize that principle with regard to income-tax returns. Upon what theory, sir, are we throwing the cloak of secrecy upon the tax returns of individuals of great wealth in this country? Are we to take the position that the ownership of property carries with it an immunity from investigation and inquiry?

Mr. President, to my mind there is not a sound argument which can be made against this amendment. I venture to say that if this proposition were submitted to a referendum it would be overwhelmingly supported by the people of this country. The principle that taxes should be levied in proportion to ability of the individual to pay has been so generally accepted that it needs no argument here; but, sir, if a veil of secrecy is to be thrown about tax returns that principle can never be enforced.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield with great pleasure.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the subject the Senator is discussing is one that ought to receive very serious consideration in the Senate. While he was discussing this matter a little while ago it occurred to me to examine the statement filed by the committee with reference to the amount of taxes from different sources——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Permit me to say a word to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON], who is suggesting that the reason I want these returns made public is to inflame the public mind. Mr. President, we can not inflame the public mind unless some wrong has been done. The purpose of the amendment is to get the truth, and nothing but the truth, before the public. We have a right to do that, I will say to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. After the Senator from Wisconsin concludes——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The discussion interrupted us.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am perfectly willing the Senator from Indiana shall say now what he desires to say.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I shall take the floor when the Senator from Wisconsin has concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was about to call the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the statement made by the committee with reference to the several sources of taxes for revenue for this fiscal year and the next fiscal year. In that statement one of the items from which we expect to get revenue is back taxes, income and personal. The amount expected from this source for the year 1922 is $230,000,000 and the amount estimated for the fiscal year 1923 is $300,000,000. The total income taxes, personal and corporate, for 1923 are estimated to be $1,290,000,000. So that the back taxes for that year would be about one-fourth of the total income taxes for the whole year. My understanding is that those back taxes are expected to be collected as the result of the auditing of returns, increasing the amount of the tax due by the taxpayer to the extent of $300,000,000 for the fiscal year 1923. I should like to hear the Senator's view as to the effect of the alleged secrecy he was discussing in making and protecting these returns upon the accuracy of the returns.

Of course, I understand that many of these inaccuracies, which are ultimately corrected and result in a higher tax, are the result of innocent mistakes; but does the Senator from Wisconsin think any considerable amount of them is the result of deliberation and that that deliberation has been more extensive in its effects upon the revenue by reason of the fact that the returns are to be secret rather than public? I am not committing myself to the views of the Senator at all; but I do think that it is a question that deserves discussion and consideration, and I am glad the Senator is discussing it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator from North Carolina. I am glad the Senator has directed my attention to that particular matter.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to have some light upon that point. It is a very remarkable statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is a remarkable statement.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amount collected as the result of the audit of these accounts is about one-fourth of the total estimated income from those two sources, corporate and individual income taxes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina will find the same situation in regard to inheritance taxes. I want to say to the Senator that there has been little change since the enactment of the income tax law. We gather somewhat more revenue than we did; we get somewhat more of a return from property that escaped taxation than we did before the enactment of the income tax law, but the evasions are enormous. One only needs to make such a superficial study to disclose the most extraordinary state of affairs in that respect.

Great estates, for instance, that have undergone transfer have so juggled their property as to escape inheritance taxes. I am coming to that in connection with another amendment which I am going to offer; but regarding the income taxes, the manner in which they have fallen off in recent years is not explained altogether by the fact that tax-exempt securities offer an opportunity to escape taxation. That plays a part, but not so important a part as has been made to appear in the course of this debate. The Senator from North Carolina, himself a member of the Committee on Finance, will remember that Secretary of the Treasury Mellon said that the importance of the tax-exempt securities, as bearing upon the shrinkage in revenue, had been exaggerated. He pointed out that there were other methods of evading taxation that very much exceeded those that were offered by the tax-exempt securities.

One thing should be remembered in connection with this matter, and that is, that the control of industry is a matter of tremendous moment to men of large wealth. They organize industrial combinations for the purpose of mastering the market in each particular line of production. It is not possible for them to withdraw their capital——

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wisconsin will pardon me, I want to say in addition, referring to the observation just made a few moments ago by the Senator, that I have been very much impressed, and very unfavorably impressed, by the threat that has been made in connection with this bill, both in the Committee on Finance and on the floor of the Senate, that if we taxed certain people in this country, certain organizations, as high as we thought they ought to be taxed in order that they might be made to contribute their reasonable pro rata share of the expenses of the Government, the taxes we imposed would not bring the result we anticipated, because the taxpayer would evade the taxes. It has been made an argument here upon the floor of the Senate why we should not impose these just taxes, that if we did impose them the taxpayer would find means to evade and to escape and to defeat the purpose of the legislation.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, the Senator calls attention to the threat that has been made that wealth defies the Government; that it will not pay its share of the burdens of government, and well he may since the Secretary of the Treasury has laid it down as a proposition that we can not make wealth pay; that we might as well accept the fact that we must establish a system of taxation that will make the people pay; that wealth will not bear its share. That is the declaration from the head of the fiscal department of this Government, and in my opinion a man who holds such views should be retired from his office.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, the Secretary of the Treasury said, speaking to the committee, that numerous schemes had been concocted and devised and worked out by which these taxes could be defeated and would be defeated. If we have reached that point where the Government, because its hands are tied or for some other reason, because of inefficiency, possibly, is not able to thwart the schemes of men who deliberately and dishonestly set about to override and defeat and circumvent the law, we ought to try to devise by legislation means to help out our weak, feeble, and inefficient administrative officials.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator from North Carolina has made an admirable statement not only of the position taken by the Secretary, into which I shall go more fully later, but of the obligation that rests upon the Congress. This issue can not be evaded. It will be carried to the people of this country; it will be one of the dominant issues that the supporters of this tax bill will have to meet on the platform and before the people—Shall the wealth of this country escape taxation? Are the American people helpless? Are they to be defied? I say no, and for one I challenge the position of the Secretary of the Treasury. He also stated that there are a multiplicity of devices that wealth may employ to escape taxation. I shall bring his testimony to the attention of the Senate before this debate is concluded.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think he mentioned 15 or 20 of them, although I am not quite sure about that.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes; he said there are dozens of ways by which wealth could get out of paying its share. The challenge has been made, and, for one, I take it up, and before this bill has been many months upon the statute books it shall be understood by the people that this bill embodies that theory, and that this Secretary who has had an important part in the modeling of this bill is an exponent of the theory that wealth can not be made to bear its just share. Wealth can not be taxed—that is the declaration——

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Who makes such a declaration?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Where does he make it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He made it in the testimony before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Why does not the Senator, then, point it out?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, I will point it out; possess your soul in patience for a little while.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. "Upon the heat and flame of your distemper sprinkle cool patience."

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Never mind Shakespeare; he is a little bit out of place in this discussion. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Do not look at me——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I can not help looking at the Senator; he projects himself up into the landscape.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I am in the purer air, the clearer atmosphere.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I have no doubt that the Senator thinks he is in a clearer atmosphere.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not mean to be offensive.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator can not be.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, I was prompted——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. If the Senator had been in his seat and had heard me state that the Secretary of the Treasury had given testimony before the committee and that I proposed to submit it, he would have been willing to wait a moment, I think.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will wait in all patience until the Senator makes his statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I hope the Senator will. I shall not only make it good, but I shall make it more than good.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator—and I did not follow him, perhaps, accurately—did the Secretary, or did he not, advise that we refrain from certain taxes because of these evasions?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He advised that we not only cut the surtaxes down to 32 per cent, but he said we had better cut them down to 25 per cent——

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Because wealth will not pay. We will collect more—that is what it meant—we will collect more at 25 per cent than we will at 32 per cent. There is no question about what he said. I will read his testimony. The Senator from California is anxious that I should take it up a little sooner than I had intended. I was coming to it in an orderly way.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. REED. Not only was the suggestion made that the taxes should be reduced in many respects, but the chief reason advanced was that more money would be raised by a lower tax than by the present rates.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; because they would not stand the higher tax; they would not pay it.

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; they had devised means that would enable them to beat the law, or the purpose of the law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, my recollection is that the inquiry was made whether they would invest their money in tax-free securities, and the Secretary's answer was, "Yes; and in other ways." I do not remember how many he named. He did, I think, specify them by numbers.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I can remember one. He told of some gentleman, I think he said a friend of his, who had invested a large amount of money in land——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, yes; in coal properties.

Mr. REED. Properties that he expected and intended to have lie dead, useless, for many years, and to pay only a small part of the price, and give——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, why would it not be better, if the Senator from Wisconsin will permit me, and the Senator from Missouri, to read the Secretary's statement, rather than to put interpretations upon it before it is read, and let it speak for itself before we interpret it?

Mr. REED. Why would it not be better for the Senator to let me finish my statement?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. REED. One of the devices was to buy these properties, give notes for nearly all of the purchase price, and then deduct the interest on the notes from the income. I have had occasion to comment on that statement.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I do not want to interject myself into this controversy, but I do not hesitate to state that the Secretary of the Treasury will be entirely willing to stand by any statement he has made; that he stated fundamental truths, admitted by every economist and student of these questions, and with a mind undistorted by hysteria or swayed by demagogism; and any statement that he has made before the Finance Committee—and I think I heard all of them—he will doubtless be willing to repeat or reaffirm anywhere that the occasion may call for.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Why, of course, he will, Mr. President. It is not necessary for the chairman to interject his comment about demagogism into this debate on every occasion simply because he has no other answer to argument It does not advance the cause that he stands for with the American people. He had better sit in his seat than to do that.

Mr. President, I am here prepared with the statements. If Senators are so anxious to have them in advance of the time when I was going to present them, they can have them now.

Upon this point—that is, the point upon which I am talking—I wish to quote the testimony of Secretary of the Treasury Mellon before the Finance Committee on September 8, 1921. In discussing the loss of revenue from large incomes, he says—now, I am quoting his exact language——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I think this testimony ought to be heard. I suggest the absence of a quorum. There are very few Senators in their seats.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Harrison	Moses	Shortridge
Brandegee	Heflin	Myers	Simmons
Bursum	Hitchcock	Nelson	Smoot
Cameron	Johnson	New	Spencer

Frelinghuysen	Lenroot	Phipps	Weller
Gerry	McCumber	Poindexter	Willis
Gooding	McKellar	Pomerene
Hale	McKinley	Reed
Harris	McNary	Sheppard

Mr. GERRY. I desire to announce that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have just turned to the testimony of Secretary Mellon as taken by the Committee on Finance, on September 8, 1921. He discussed the loss of revenue from large incomes, and I will now state Secretary Mellon's views upon this subject:

> Generally what is referred to as the chief factor is the investment in tax-free securities.

That is, he had been discussing the chief factor of the loss of revenue from the incomes in the higher brackets, where they paid higher surtaxes. I repeat that:

> Generally what is referred to as the chief factor is the investment in tax-free securities. That is not so. The investment in tax-free securities is a large factor, but it is not the leading factor. There are many other methods.
> For instance, from my knowledge of incomes in business, etc., of individuals, I do not know among them any who to any large extent invest in tax-free securities, for the reason that they have not the free cash with which to do it. They are generally people who are in industrial line of business, and they have to carry on their business, and they need their capital. They can not get it out to invest it in tax-free securities. I do not think that is the largest item.

Mr. President, that supports what I said a few moments before the interruption, that these masters of our industrial organizations will not withdraw their capital from the control of the industries of this country to put it into tax-exempt securities which pay 4 or 5 per cent. It is another class, it is another type, that invests in that sort of securities, and I shall try to reach them by an amendment which I am going to ask the Senate to vote upon a little later.

Men like Morgan, men of that type, who organized the United States Steel Corporation, organized the Beef and Food Trusts of this country, as have the packers, are not pulling out the capital invested in those businesses to put into tax-exempt securities which pay 5 per cent, or 4½, or even 6 per cent. The mastery of the business, the control of their lines of industry, mean immense returns upon the capital invested. It is not figured by a meager percentage, and Mr. Mellon is absolutely right about that. That is not the chief source. But listen to what he says:

But if you take a man who may have an income of three or four hundred thousand dollars a year, or a larger amount, he can do so many things. He can divide up his property with his wife and his children.

He is now pointing out how wealth can defy the laws enacted to make it bear its proportionate share of the burdens of government. He knows the game. He has studied it.

I continue my quotation from his testimony. I repeat that last sentence:

He can divide up his property with his wife and his children, and that cuts his brackets down because his income is less, and he does not pay the high surtax.

Congress says he shall pay a certain tax upon his income. Mr. Mellon says that he can evade that obligation which Congress puts upon him. He can do it in many ways which Mr. Mellon points out, and this is one of the ways. Then, going a step further, he said:

Or he can make trusts for his children and those to come after him and part with his property, with a trust that accumulates for them, and therefore he is relieved; he immediately drops from the higher surtax down to the lower surtax.

There are dozens of plans. It is shown and proved in the result in the department, where you see that the number of higher surtax people are dropping down and the revenue is going down.

There is not a suggestion as to how it shall be met. He continues:

There are so many of these different ways that I know of that have not been actually availed of.

He had thought out some ways that nobody had yet availed himself of.

Mr. SIMMONS. He said there were dozens, did he not?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. He said there were dozens of ways he knew about that the other fellows had not gotten on to yet. That is his testimony. He gives an example:

For instance, I know of a man who has a large income, a very high income. He invested in a piece of real estate. It was coal property. It cost about $4,000,000. The reason he invested in that was that he considered that at some time in the future it would have greater value and that perhaps at that time in the future there would not be the same surtax or high tax rate, and in the meantime it would be increasing in value.

He knew that this propaganda had been on, of course, to make Congress forbear on these higher incomes; to force Congress to compromise and take off part of the surtaxes. He went on to say:

He was using his money in other directions, but he bought that property on a payment of a comparatively small amount down. He made a payment of $200,000 down and then a payment of $200,000 a year running each year for 10 years, and at the end of the 10 years he would pay the balance or the bulk of the purchase money. He paid 6 per cent interest on the money.

That was the effect of his large surtax. In that instance he paid somewhere about 65 per cent. The interest at 6 per cent was deductible from his income, and therefore the Government paid 60 per cent of his 6 per cent interest. In other words, the Government carries the payment of that interest for the time and he goes free to the end of the time and pays off his property and he can sell it then and make his profit, and if there is not a large tax at that time he is that much ahead.

But the point is that in the meantime the Government has relieved him. Instead of paying 6 per cent he is paying 2½ per cent to carry that property, because the interest he pays is deductible from income, and he gets that deduction which relieves him to that extent.

Senator REED. He does not work his coal field?

Secretary MELLON. No; it is just standing there.

Senator REED. Why could not that be reached by a proper clause in the law?

Secretary MELLON. That could be reached—

Now, mark this—but you can keep on putting proper clauses in and reaching something and then something else. That is just one instance. There are all kinds of ways, and the people who resort to them are within their rights in doing it. They avoid taxes by making investments. It is human nature, and you can not change human nature.

In plain language the Secretary revealed that the loss of revenue in the form of taxes on men of great wealth was not due to the fact that they have transferred their investments to tax-exempt securities but was instead the result of deliberate and cunning tax dodging.

You will note that the Secretary admits that these methods of tax dodging which he describes could be prevented by appropriate legislation, but he does not recommend the enactment of such legislation, because he believes that other methods of evasion will be invented. I assume he believes that, and give him the benefit of it.

Mr. REED. He said so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That attitude, if carried throughout the field of legislation, would mean the end of law and the beginning of anarchy. It would mean that wherever we find an individual or corporation strong enough or cunning enough to evade a law, that law should be repealed, or made so ineffective in its restrictions that the violator would not object to its existence; and that is the course that has been pursued in the framing of this bill.

There has not been any attempt made, as the bill was reported, to meet these evasions. There has not been any attempt to go after these men who betray their obligations to the Government. Such an attitude amounts, in my opinion, to lawlessness. I can not understand how men of great wealth who, with the advice of lawyers and tax experts, devise cunning plans to defeat the intent of legislation, differ either in kind or in degree from petty criminals who evade or violate laws of less consequence to the Government.

I propose to offer some amendments that will in part, and I hope in large measure, remedy some of the defects in this legislation.

I am unable to understand the attitude of a high Government official who regards such evasion only as an argument for weakening the law, who after all is responsible for the proposal to make enormous and unprecedented reduction in supertaxes. There seems to be no doubt that the responsibility may be squarely placed upon the Secretary of the Treasury, who is himself credited with being one of the richest men in the country. It was he who recommended to the House committee that supertaxes should be reduced to 25 per cent and that this loss of revenue should be compensated for by an increase in various taxes which fall upon the entire body of citizens, such, for example, as his proposed 1-cent increase in the postal rates, for that is one of the propositions he submitted.

Mr. SIMMONS. That would raise $70,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; it would raise $70,000,000 out of the people. Finally, by the time the bill reached the Finance Committee of the Senate, and after the treatment that his suggestion had met with in the House, he had learned a little discretion and did not press it with vigor before the Senate Committee on Finance.

In order that there may be no question about Secretary Mellon's ideas on this subject, let me quote from his testimony before the Senate Committee on Finance on September 8, 1921, and this, Mr. President, is something to which I invite the attention of all Senators on the floor. Here is a declaration from the head of the fiscal department of the Government as to how all the revenues of government shall be raised. I believe that his declaration in this behalf has been overlooked by other Senators; at least I have not heard in the debate any reference made to it. I think it should be written in letters that shall be so livid that they will fix and hold the attention of all the people of the United States. I think it would explain many things with respect to the soldiers' adjusted compensation legislation and the form in which we are told it is to finally be offered to the Congress of the United States.

In order that there may be no question about Secretary Mellon's ideas upon the subject of how the revenue of the Government shall be raised, let me quote from his testimony before the Senate Committee on Finance on September 8, 1921. The Senator from California, who was so ambitious to hear this testimony, seems to have disappeared from the floor. He has not been present during any of the time I have been reading it, and I took it somewhat out of order in the discussion as I have planned it because he called for it.

Mr. KENYON. Which Senator from California?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The junior Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE].

I repeat, in order that there may be no question about Secretary Mellon's ideas upon the subject, let me quote from his testimony before the Senate Committee on Finance on September 8, 1921, hearings, page 159.

Senator WATSON. Then you think that 25 per cent surtax is the point at which we would get the most revenue and do the least harm?

Secretary MELLON. I think this, that 25 per cent will bring more revenue than the higher rate will.

Taken in connection with his former statement, that means that wealth will not pay if we put on the higher rate. They will dodge it. He went on to say:

The situation is not generally understood; and to recommend a lower level than that would not be fully understood. But I believe that a lower level would in the course of a year or two years be more productive than 25 per cent.

Through dickers and deals for the time being the rate has been raised from 32 up to 50 per cent. I do not know how long it will stay there.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator in connection with his suggestion that he did not know whether this scheme had been discussed, that both the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] and myself have discussed on the floor of the Senate somewhat at length the Mellon scheme of raising this large amount of money that we need.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; but I undertake to say that the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, not in such detail as the Senator is giving.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Whatever the Senator has discussed was discussed more forcefully than I could. However, I think I am coming to some testimony of Secretary Mellon that has been wholly overlooked and upon which I am anxious to have not only the attention but the views of the Senator from North Carolina when I shall have laid it before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to say that I am delighted that the Senator is elaborating the Mellon view of raising money to run the Government.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It should be remembered, Senators, and it seems to me we ought all of us to remember, that more important than the phraseology of any law are the views of the man who administers that law. The wisest lawgiver of all time could not write to-day a body of statutes to perpetuate a perfected democracy. Through all time it would be left to each generation to fight, no matter how perfect the laws may be upon the statute books, for the honest administration of those laws to carry out the spirit that is back of them.

Keep this in mind. I am giving the views of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, the man whose recommendations must have great weight with the President of the United States when he writes his messages upon a fiscal policy, the man into whose hands the Congress of the United States commits the administration of every law that it writes with respect to the finances of the Government. What are his views with respect to how the burdens of Government should be borne?

What does he believe should be the theory governing our taxation system? In the first place, he thinks 25 per cent should be the maximum surtax.

I believe a lower level would in the course of a year or two years be more productive than 25.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Mellon, did you recommend this lower rate to the Ways and Means Committee?

Secretary MELLON. I did.

The CHAIRMAN. I did not remember that.

Secretary MELLON. Yes, sir; that rate was recommended beginning January 1, 1922.

The CHAIRMAN. They made a higher rate?

Secretary MELLON. They made it the higher rate.

The CHAIRMAN. When would you advise having this reduction go into effect?

Secretary MELLON. The first reduction was recommended to go into effect the 1st of January, 1921; but 1921 is nearly over, and I would think, under the circumstances, that beginning with January 1, 1922, would be the proper date.

This quotation demonstrates that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended a reduction of supertaxes to a 25 per cent level, retroactive to January 1, 1921, but concluded not to urge the retroactive feature. The quotation also demonstrates that Mr. Mellon believes the supertax rate should be reduced even below the 25 per cent level and presumably will use his influence as Secretary of the Treasury to have the rate still further reduced at the next revision of the revenue law.

Even this quotation, however, fails to give a real picture of the ideas of the present Secretary of the Treasury upon how and where taxes necessary to run the Government should be collected. Let me read another quotation from the testimony given upon the same day, hearings, page 163:

Secretary MELLON. Of course, you can not add a tax on manufactured products without adding the tax to the consumer.

He is discussing a sales tax now.

It goes to the consumer. For instance, all food that is manufactured, you add that tax to all food. Clothing is all manufactured.

He was discussing the tax that some of the Senators voted for as presented by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], the manufacturer's sales tax.

For instance—

He says—

all food that is manufactured, you add that tax to all food. Clothing is all manufactured. All items of necessities of life are manufactured, and that tax is added.

Senators who voted for the proposition presented by the Senator from Utah voted to add so much to the price of the necessaries of life. Here is the testimony of Secretary Mellon to prove it:

Senator SMOOT. They are all sold at retail, too.

Secretary MELLON. That is all very true, but you are specifically adding a tax at the source of production. Now, that is not a good place to put the burden.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Secretary expressed his opinion, and the Senator from Wisconsin whom I am addressing agreed with the Secretary, did he not, by his vote on yesterday?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, I did not agree with the Secretary at all. If the Senator will wait a little while he will see that the Secretary is in favor of raising all revenue by a sales tax. I do not agree with the Secretary. Oh, no.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me for just a moment, I understood him to read from the testimony to the effect that the Secretary argued that placing a so-called sales tax on the manufacturer would go on down to and rest upon the consumer. I understood the Senator was opposed to that. I recall as of yesterday that the Senator who is speaking voted against that, and I inferred that he quite agreed with the Secretary of the Treasury upon that proposition.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; the Senator entirely misapprehends my position.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I will be very glad to have it explained.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator will surely have it explained; I am very glad to explain it to the Senator. The Secretary was just pointing out in the testimony from which I am reading that there can be no misunderstanding about this so-called manufacturers' tax. It may be called what one pleases, but the consumer pays it. That is all the Secretary is saying here. It is just the same as if it is put on at the other end of the line.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Secretary was opposed to that, and was not the Senator opposed to it?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will show the Senator, if he will wait for a little while, that the Secretary of the Treasury wanted to raise every dollar of taxes from this kind of a tax. That, I think, is most reprehensible.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. He might be wrong——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was just simply approaching it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. But what I am objecting to, if it be objecting, are the terms used in characterizing the views of the Secretary. He may be in error, but I would not impute evil to him. That is what prompted me to make the interruption.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course, I am not questioning the motives of the Secretary; I am simply pointing out his point of view, his cast of mind. I say that from my point of view one who looks at the fiscal policy of the Government of the United States from his point of view is unfit to administer it. The Senator from California and I can not possibly have any controversy about that.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not object when we——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am not questioning that every man has a right to his point of view. I merely think it is bad public policy to have at the head of the Treasury Department a man who has such views as expressed in the testimony which I have read from Mr. Mellon. That is my idea.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator indulge me in the expression of just one other thought?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With great pleasure.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Secretary of the Treasury has great power under the law, but he can not make the law.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; that is true.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I appreciate what the learned Senator said a moment ago, that those who administer the law may color or discolor it, dependent upon their point of view, but it seems to me the Senator exalts the Secretary of the Treasury and makes him a ruler of this Nation, whereas Congress has the power to make the laws and to see to it that they are enforced.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. It occurs to me that the Senator attributes to the Secretary of the Treasury too much power.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Perhaps so; in the Senator's point of view that may be so; but it is not so from my point of view. I do not know of any business concern in this country that inaugurates a policy that should control that business and then install an executive to carry out that policy who was opposed to it. Can the Senator from California conceive of that being done by any business concern?

Mr. President, it is well known, it is well understood, and everybody must agree, it seems to me, that it is possible for an executive to administer a law, no matter how carefully it may be drawn, in such a manner that the law will fail of its purpose. That is my point of view, and I will undertake to say that the Senator from California would not put in charge of a business in which he had a financial interest a man who was opposed to the ideas he had as to how that business should be conducted.

Now, I should like to get this statement before the Senate if I can. In order to have it connected I am going to begin back a little bit, quoting from Secretary Mellon's testimony:

Secretary MELLON. Of course, you can not add a tax on manufactured products without adding the tax to the consumer. It goes to the consumer. For instance, the food that is manufactured, you add that tax to all food. Clothing is all manufactured. All items of necessities of life are manufactured, and that tax is added.

Senator SMOOT. They are all sold at retail, too.

Secretary MELLON. That is all very true, but you are specifically adding a tax at the source of production. Now, that is not a good place to put the burden.

Senator SMOOT. You want to put it on the consumer?

SECRETARY MELLON. Well, you had better put it equitably on the consumer than to put it there, because then it goes on at the time when the article goes into consumption and it is more direct.

I wonder if Senators get the real significance of that? It seems to me that Secretary Mellon was a little afraid that the manufacturer might pay some of the tax; that it might not all be carried on to the consumer; and, in view of what he says a little later, I think it is pretty clear that he wants the consumer to pay the tax in full and that the manufacturer shall not, as a manufacturer, bear any part of it. Listen:

Senator WATSON. Of course, the sales tax goes directly to the consumer, and it is paid by him and manifestly that is the very object of it.

Senator DILLINGHAM. But every manufacturer who has been before us has said that he passes his tax on to the consumer; every one of them invariably has said that.

Senator REED. And add a profit to it?

Secretary MELLON. It could not be otherwise. It must go that way.

Senator SMOOT. So I do not think there would be 1 per cent of the manufacturers of the United States that would object to it.

Naturally there would not be if they did not pay any of it.

Secretary MELLON. I think this—

Now, listen:

Secretary MELLON. I think this, that the ideal system of taxation, if it could be inaugurated, if you could do away with all of the other taxes and make an equitable tax on all turnovers—all sales of real estate, goods, wares, and merchandise, everything, it would spread the burden of taxation as much as it can be spread, with the exception of some taxes like excise taxes on tobacco and places peculiarly adapted for taxation, and then you would have the ideal system; but it would be a mistake to piece up the system of taxation to bring in new methods of imposing taxes at a time like this.

There you have it. There are the views of the man who is at the head of the Treasury Department of this Government, upon whose views the fiscal policy of this administration is to be based.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the plan were to be adopted which the Secretary suggested, what then would become of the gentleman of whom he spoke who takes $4,000,000 and puts it into coal lands and does not turn it over at all?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it has been a part of the settled plan back of the sales-tax propaganda which has been going on for two or three years to wipe out all income taxes and all other taxes now upon the statute books and to substitute therefor a turnover sales tax. That has been the plan.

The Senator from Utah started in with a scheme that was going to yield $3,000,000,000. He talked about it in the committee from day to day. He found a rising tide of opposition against it, and he began to pare it down. It was practically defeated over in the House, largely under the leadership of a Member of Congress from Wisconsin, Representative FREAR; and gradually the Senator from Utah, who was its spokesman and champion, has been retrenching, cutting down on the proposition, until finally it became the meager thing that we saw presented here, in the hope, I believe, that if the principal could be introduced it could be expanded. Now we are to have it tied up with the bonus legislation in the hope that the generosity, the admiration, and the devotion of the people of this country to their soldiery may be put behind it and thus get it upon the statute books.

Senators, from early Roman times down to date, whenever the sales tax has been applied by any government it has utterly failed. This is not a new scheme; it did not originate with the Senator from Utah; it is nearly as old as government itself. It has been the device of governments that were in desperate financial straits. It is interesting to review its history. I had prepared in some degree to take it up and discuss it, but I could see no purpose in entering upon that debate, for I felt very confident that the Senate was going to reject it, as it did by an overwhelming vote. But, Mr. President, if it is to be tied up to the soldiers' compensation legislation, it must receive a more thoroughgoing treatment.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, at this point I want to direct the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the significant fact that one of the conditions of the abridged proposition of the Senator from Utah was that the tax he proposed to raise from consumption was to be substituted for a 5 per cent additional tax that the Senate had already voted upon corporations.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, indeed; that is true, Mr. President. It has been hooked up variously, first this way and then that. The Senator from Utah was willing to do almost anything with it in order to help it along.

Mr. SIMMONS. The provision cutting down the corporation income tax that we had already voted was so irrelevant to the purposes of the sales tax that it could not have been put in there except because of the desire of the author to see that the corporations got a benefit of at least $314,000,000 from this consumption tax.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think that is very patent, Mr. President.

Now, I want to come back and beg the attention of the Senate to the particular amendment that is before the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to let the matter pass without having it emphasized. The Senator from Wisconsin read a statement from the Secretary of the Treasury to the effect that all taxes should be paid on turnover or sales. I asked him the question: If the taxes were raised in that way, what would become of the tax dodger who went out and invested, as the Secretary said he had known of being done, $4,000,000 in a piece of coal land, intending to hold it indefinitely? The Secretary said that was one of the devices being employed. Why could not that device prosper exceedingly under a tax which reached only sales? The sales would not occur at all for long periods of years. Money could be planted in that way and held free from taxes for a vast number of years, and then, of course, some plan could probably be found to sell the property without making any great profit.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I see that, Mr. President.

Mr. REED. The very plan for dodging taxes which the Secretary suggested would find no better opportunity to flourish than under the very plan of taxation of which he told us.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I want to bring back the attention of Senators now to the pending amendment. It is:

That when the returns of any person shall be made as provided in this title, the returns, together with any correction thereof which may have been made by the commissioner, shall be filed in the Treasury Department and shall constitute public records and be open to inspection as such under the same rules and regulations as govern the inspection of public records generally.

With respect to public records generally, any citizen can go and ask to inspect the record, and is entitled to do so; but we have modified the law in that respect with regard to the returns upon Federal taxes so that it is only through special favor that anybody can get any information whatever about returns.

Mr. President, I want just briefly and hurriedly—I do not want to take too much time—to bring to the attention of Senators the history of this as it has worked out heretofore.

We had an income tax during the war period in the sixties. It is very interesting. There was no secrecy provision in the income-tax laws of the sixties as we have in the income-tax laws of to-day. They were all open to inspection, and an agitation was started with regard to having the returns of the payers of income taxes published in New York.

Horace Greeley, editor of the Tribune, interested himself very greatly in the matter, and wrote some editorials on that subject that are very interesting. I want to read just a short extract from one of them, published in 1866, because some results followed the agitation that were very beneficial to the Government. It showed that there was a large evasion, and that a publication of the income-tax returns instituted a very considerable reform that was of very great benefit to the Government.

Here is a very short editorial by Horace Greeley in the New York Tribune of May 24, 1866:

The Evening Post has a Washington dispatch which says: "The Committee on Ways and Means have agreed to an amendment of the tax bill providing that lists of income shall not be published nor furnished for publication, but they shall be open to private inspection at the office of the collector.

You see, the tax evader was busy then, just as he is busy now, getting this thing introduced into the law and that thing introduced into the law in order that he may escape paying his taxes.

This editorial goes on to say:

We would like to believe this untrue. We believe that publicity given to the returns of income submitted by individuals to tax gatherers has already put millions of dollars into the Treasury and gone far toward equalizing the payments of the income tax by rogues with that of honest men and saved thousands from being imposed upon and swindled by false pretenses of solvency and wealth, made on purpose to incur debts preordained never to be paid. The knaves who sought credit on assumption of wealth belied by their returns of incomes, of course, hate publicity given to those returns; but why should any honest man seek to pass for any more (or less) than he is worth?

My, that is refreshing stuff; is it not? We have gotten so far away from that that you would almost think that that is a quotation from the Bible; but that was written by Horace Greeley in 1866.

Listen:

The poke-nose permission to peep privately into the returns nullifies every excuse for interdicting their publication. If a thing is fit to be known at all, it should be accurately known, not only to those who may take special pains to become acquainted with it but to each and all.

In another editorial, on January 26, 1865, the New York Tribune says:

We learn that the publishing of the list of income-tax payers in this city, against which there has been so much absurd outcry, is likely to prove beneficial to the revenue as well as to the consciences of some of our "best citizens." Already, as we understand, considerable sums have been returned to the assessors and paid to the collectors by persons who have discovered "errors" in their original returns of incomes since the publication of the lists referred to, and assessors have received valuable information in reference to the incomes of some gentlemen who should but have not yet amended their returns. The penalties for false or fraudulent returns are, first, an assessment of double the amount sought to be evaded, and, second, a fine not to exceed $1,000, or imprisonment not exceeding one year, or both, at the discretion of the court. It is presumed that all persons who on reading the printed lists discover that they have made mistakes in their returns of their annual "gains, profits, or incomes," would be able to adjust any little difference between themselves and the Public Treasury with greater facility by calling voluntarily upon the assessors of their respective districts than by taking the risk of being waited upon by those officers.

There were repeated attempts to prohibit publicity of the income-tax returns; but they were unsuccessful until 1870, when tariff and internal-revenue legislation was pending, bringing in more money than the Government needed; and in 1870, when the fight for secrecy of returns finally succeeded, the number of returns, and presumably the amount of tax paid, decreased more than 20 per cent.

The statistics published by the Internal Revenue Bureau are such that comparisons in all the classes of incomes taxed are not possible, but a comparison of the returns of those reporting incomes over $2,000 is almost conclusive.

In 1870, when the returns were published, the number showing incomes over $2,000 were 94,887. In 1871, when publicity was prohibited, the number fell to 74,000—that is, from 94,000 to 74,000; then to 72,000 in 1872, and this in spite of the fact that, as shown by individual bank deposits, bank clearings, and so forth, 1871 and 1872 were more prosperous years than 1870. Similarly in North Carolina, when the income-tax returns under the State law were published by the Hon. Josephus Daniels in his paper, the News and Observer, the tax collections immediately more than doubled.

With the secrecy of returns, it is impossible to collect the tax efficiently without an extravagantly expensive army of revenue agents and the creation of a system of espionage that would be extremely distasteful to the American people.

When the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was arguing very forcibly and eloquently a few days ago against the creation of more collection districts, I could not help thinking that that situation could be admirably met by simply having publicity with respect to these tax returns. You could cut down your force of inspectors and field agents. You could cut off this bureaucratic system of espionage to an immense degree if there were publicity of tax returns. It would correct much of this evil.

Then you would get rid of another thing. I do not know whether Senators have had their attention called to the fact that at the present time one of the important officers of the Treasury Department is under arrest for having something to do with a bribe.

Mr. KING. And abstracting some of the records.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; and he is accused of having abstracted some of the records. The details of the case I have not looked into, but I know that occasionally something of that sort comes to the surface. If you could have publicity with regard to tax returns, you would take away the incentive, you would put men on guard, you would make them more careful about making their returns. No man would dare to make a false return if he knew that the amount of his return was to be published.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think on that point there is another danger, if it is not an evil. I do not know that it is an evil, but I think it is a danger. There is vested in the hands of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue an enormous power to compromise and settle cases. During the last few years the amount of back taxes collected approximate six or seven hundred thousand dollars a day, and the estimate is now for from two hundred to three hundred million dollars. That represents a large number of cases which are compromised, settled, and adjusted under the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his assistants. I think that enormous power has been, for the most part, wisely exercised, a power to settle cases greater than most of the courts of this land possess; but there is always the danger of favoritism on the one side and extortion on the other, and publicity would to some extent do away with the danger.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I entirely agree with the Senator from Nebraska, and I feel as though the situation calls for somewhat plainer speaking.

We might just as well face this thing as it is. There is a limit to the integrity you can maintain in the public service in the face of enormous temptation. A Senator on this floor a few days ago said to me, with regard to the enforcement of the prohibition laws, that in his own State his one best friend, who had been his strongest political supporter for many years, a man with as high integrity as that of any man with whom he had been associated, a man in whom he had every confidence, who had been given one of the important positions in the enforcement of prohibition, had made $200,000 in a little over two months out of his position, and that Senator said to me, "If the lid were taken off with regard to the corruption which exists to-day in connection with the enforcement of the prohibition statutes, it would horrify the country, and might provoke a revolt."

Mr. President, the same is true with respect to the enforcement of our tax laws. We need not flinch this thing, or try to smooth it over with nice phrases about the law being administered with fairly good results. The record itself shows that the law is not enforced. The merest novice looking at the returns knows perfectly well that the whole business is honeycombed with crookedness and subterfuge and evasion.

Take the inheritance-tax laws. There is no question about that, not a particle. All you have to do is to make a list of the estates of people who died worth more than $10,000,000 in 1921, 1919, and 1918 to know that those laws are being evaded.

Mr. President, I want to call attention to a few serious words said by former President Harrison. As a young man, I was in public life when he was President. I think he was a very able man.

Former President Harrison appeared before the Union League Club in Chicago on the 22d of February, 1898, and delivered an address on the obligations of wealth. I had been making an address in the State of Wisconsin, starting in 1897, making the same appeal, and I published those two addresses together in parallel columns, and went before the people of my State to exculpate myself from the charge which had been made against me, by the stand-pat Republicans of that State, that I was an anarchist and a socialist because I wanted the corporate property of Wisconsin to pay taxes at the same rate as was imposed on the owners of homes, and farms, and factories, and stores.

I want to quote just a few lines from former President Harrison's remarkable address. These words are just as vital and throbbing with life to-day as when they fell from his lips more than 20 years ago:

We live in a time of great agitation, of a war of clashing thoughts and interests.

We had just come out of the Spanish-American War. Ex-President Harrison continued:

There is a feeling that some men are handicapped; that the race is sold; that the old and much vaunted equality of opportunity and of right has been submerged. More bitter and threatening things are being said and written against accumulated property and corporate power than ever before. It is said that, more and more, small men, small stores, and small factories are being thrown upon the shore as financial drift; that the pursuit of cheapness has reached a stage where only enormous combinations of capital, doing an enormous business, are sure of returns.

He said again:

The great bulk of our people are lovers of justice. They do not believe that poverty is a virtue or property a crime. They believe in an equality of opportunity and not of dollars. But there must be no handicapping of the dull brother and no chicanery or fraud or shirking. If our plan of taxation includes notes and bonds and stocks they must be listed. The plea of business privacy—

Which you may hear on this floor in opposition to my amendment—

has been driven too hard. If for mere statistical purposes we may ask the head of the family whether there are any idiots in his household and enforce an answer by court process, we may surely, for revenue purposes, require a detailed list of his securities.

Why not publicity with regard to his income returns, which I am asking for in this amendment? Do you think you can make opposition to that kind of a proposal and stand up before the citizens of any State in this Union when you get a chance to argue it out with them face to face? I tell you you can not. He continues:

> The men who have wealth must not hide it from the tax gatherer and flaunt it on the street. Such things breed a great discontent. All other men are hurt. They bear a disproportionate burden. A strong soldier will carry the knapsack of a crippled comrade, but he will not permit a robust shirk to add so much as his tin cup to the burden.

Said former President Harrison to the Union League Club, of Chicago, a Republican organization:

> The special purpose of my address to-day is to press home this thought upon the prosperous, well-to-do people of our communities and especially of our great cities, that one of the conditions of the security of wealth is a proportionate and full contribution to the expenses of the State and local governments. It is not only wrong but it is unsafe to make a show in our homes and on the street that is not made in the tax returns.

I wish to perpetuate these words and carry them to the people of the country. They ought to live as a part of our moral standard of citizenship. Again, former President Harrison said:

> It is a part of our individual covenant as citizens with the State that we will, honestly and fully, in the rate or proportion fixed from time to time by law, contribute our just share to all public expenses. A full and conscientious discharge of that duty by the citizen is one of the tests of good citizenship. To evade that duty is a moral delinquency, an unpatriotic act * * * I want to emphasize, if I can, the thought that the preservation of this principle of a proportionate contribution, according to the true value of what each man has, to the public expenditures, is essential to the maintenance of our free institutions and of peace and good order in our communities.

I quote him further:

> Taxes are a debt of the highest obligation, and no casuist can draw a sound moral distinction between the man who hides his property or makes a false return in order to escape the payment of his debt to the State and the man who conceals his property from his private creditors. Nor should it be more difficult to follow the defaulter in the one case than in the other. If our taxes were farmed out to an individual or to a corporation, they would be collected. There would be a vigilant and unrelenting pursuit. The civil and criminal processes of the law would be invoked with effect, just as they were against fraudulent debtors under the bankrupt law.

He paraphrases President Lincoln's startling declaration:

> Mr. Lincoln's startling declaration that this country could not continue to exist half slave and half free may be paraphrased to-day by saying that this country can not continue to exist half taxed and half free.

Mr. President, the falling off of the income tax is not due entirely to an investment of money in other directions. The review of tax returns and the contests that occupy the attention of the Internal Revenue Department from day to day, cited a moment ago, to the amount of—may I ask the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] how many million?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is approximately $200,000,000 a year, which would be something like $700,000 a day.

If the Senator will permit me, these great transactions are all done in the dark, as though a court were sitting as a tribunal to decide the case in the dark. I do not question the integrity of what has been done, but I say it is a dangerous power to intrust to any public official in secret.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is supported by just what I am reading from former President Harrison. I find another paragraph which I had marked:

> We have too much treated the matter of a man's tax return as a personal matter.
> We have put his transactions with the State on much the same level with his transactions with his banker, but that is not the true basis. Each citizen has a personal interest, a pecuniary interest, in the tax return of his neighbor. We are members of a great partnership, and it is the right of each to know what every other member is contributing to the partnership and what he is taking from it.

It is not a private affair. It is a public concern of the first importance.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. STANLEY. Whether true or false, the air in this Chamber at times has been filled with subtle rumors of efforts to obtain an undue influence over those who have the last secret and final determination of the heavy-tax payer's responsibility to his Government. I wish to ask the Senator if he does not believe in justice to the man who wants to pay his taxes, who is willing to bear his full burden, that this publicity would be a vindication to him if he is wrongly charged with an effort to influence unduly as well as a means of protecting the guilty?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Indeed it would, Mr. President, and it seems to me that every man who is honest in making his tax returns, and every Senator who believes in integrity and the taxation principle that each citizen shall bear his share of the burden according to his ability to pay, ought to feel that this amendment offers an opportunity of insuring fairness and vindication to every honest man, as well as a conviction of the guilty tax dodger. No one ought to be ashamed of the amount of income that he has. No one ought to want to conceal it. Unless there is something about the way in which it is derived, unless he is getting more than he feels he can justify on the capital that he has invested, he ought to be glad of the opportunity to put his income, derived from all legitimate investments, upon the record to be seen of all the world and judged by his neighbors in order that every man may know that he at least is discharging to the fullest measure his obligation of citizenship to take care of and support and maintain the Government according to his ability to do so.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if there is any ground for distinction between this publicity as applied to State returns and State taxes and as applied to Federal taxes? For instance, in the State one can go to the tax books and ascertain precisely what each individual pays on real estate and on personal property. It is a public record.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Of course.

Mr. FLETCHER. Why should there be a distinction between that and the return which the taxpayer makes to the Federal Government?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. There certainly should not be. It can not be argued that there ought to be upon any principle, moral or legal. The matter of supporting the Government is an obligation that we owe to municipal governments, to State governments, and to the Federal Government. It rests upon all alike. Each man should shoulder his part of it—the poor bearing their part, the rich bearing their part—and we never can tell whether each man, as President Harrison said, of this partnership of which we are all members in this great Government of ours is doing his full share without knowing what each one is contributing.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. I have never been in favor of a too inquisitorial power going into details of the business of the taxpayer, but there is a vast difference between how far the Government inspector or the Government tax collector shall go in regulating the business of a citizen and determining whether the facts which he ascertains shall be made public or not.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Indeed, there is a wide difference.

Mr. STANLEY. There is a wide difference there, indeed. I do not wish to take up the time of the Senator, but many seem to confuse the difference between the inquisitorial powers of a tax collector in ascertaining the facts and the making of his findings public. To give to any bureau of the Government the right to know and to keep the political sins of powerful citizens is to place in the hands of any man who is desirous or ambitious enough to do it an instrument of political blackmail that in times past has been used by men almost as high in office as the President of the United States himself. That is an open secret.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think we are simply inviting the worst form of bureaucracy conceivable.

Mr. STANLEY. And corruption.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. And corruption going with it. There will come some day a visitation upon this Government that will be appalling in its results if it is not checked. There is no question about what is happening in the departments. The revelations made by the arrest the other day, the whisperings that we hear upon all sides, admonish us that we ought to check this thing. I know of no more effective way than publicity; I know of no better check. It makes the law almost self-administrative. It will limit and cut off the work that the revenue agents and the sleuths and Secret Service men find it necessary now to do.

Mr. President, I am admonished that time is passing. I will submit, Mr. President, this amendment, in so far as I care to argue it up to the present time, to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. President, I desire to announce at this time that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family. If he were present, he would vote for this amendment, and also for the inheritance tax amendment which I shall offer so soon as a vote is had upon this one.

Mr. CURTIS. May the amendment be reported?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think we can save time by not calling for a quorum. I do not care to do that. If the Senate is ready to vote upon the amendment, I shall ask for a roll call; but if it is to be argued further, I am quite ready to let the argument proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHORTRIDGE in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 125, it is proposed to strike out lines 2 to 25, both inclusive, and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 126 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

AMENDMENT NO. 1.

SEC. 257. That when the returns of any person shall be made as provided in this title the returns, together with any correction thereof which may have been made by the commissioner, shall be filed in the Treasury Department and shall constitute public records and be open to inspection as such under the same rules and regulations as govern the inspection of public records generally.

AMENDMENT NO. 2.

Page 126, line 10, after the word "addresses," insert "and amount of income."

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Wisconsin whether or not the words "filed in the Treasury Department" would compel the filing of the returns in Washington, or would it be sufficient to treat the branches of the department where they are filed as the Treasury Department? I am not sure whether the returns are brought to Washington or are left in the various internal revenue subdivisions of the States where they are filed. I was not quite clear what the Senator from Wisconsin had in mind—whether the returns were to be brought to Washington or left with the agents of the Treasury Department in the various States.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I have consulted with the Treasury Department officials here who have been in attendance upon us during the consideration of this legislation and framed the amendment in the form in which I have submitted it. I have drawn it in a slightly different form at the suggestion of Dr. Walker, who believed that it would be easily administered and that it would meet the situation. If the Senator from Utah has any doubt about it, I shall be very glad to receive any suggestion by way of amendment for further clarification. I want the amendment to be effective.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think there can be no doubt about the practice. The returns are made primarily to the collectors of internal revenue. My understanding is that they are then transmitted to the Treasury Department here for the purpose of being investigated and checked up. Therefore, the final repository is the Treasury Department in Washington.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I so understood. Now, Mr. President, I ask for a roll call upon the amendment, if the roll call has not already been ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]). In his absence, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. MYERS (when his name was called). The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. MCLEAN], with whom I have a pair, is absent, and I therefore withhold by vote.

Mr. RANSDELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT]. In his absence, I withhold my vote.

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. Being unable to obtain a transfer of that pair, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRIS (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] to the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG], who is absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. I inquire if the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed that Senator has not voted.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with that Senator, and as I am unable to obtain a transfer, I will be compelled to withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. STANFIELD], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. HARRISON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PENROSE (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I observe that he has not voted. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. CROW] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS];

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN]; and

So Mr. LA FOLLETTE's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana and Mr. WATSON of Georgia addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, under a construction placed upon the terms of the unanimous consent agreement under which we are operating, it appears that the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to occupy the time until 3 o'clock, that is to say——

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield, certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not think any Senator who was here last night will contend that to be so. It was distinctly stated upon the other side that, if the agreement was entered into, both sides should have an opportunity to be heard upon the amendment.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is quite true, but I am speaking now of the construction which has been placed upon the agreement, according to my understanding of his interpretation of the rule, by the Senator from Wisconsin. The agreement provides:

> That at 10 o'clock a. m. on said day the Senate will proceed at once to the consideration of amendments that may be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and will continue such consideration until the hour of 3 o'clock p. m. unless the amendments are sooner disposed of.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from Indiana a question.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Does the Senator from Indiana think that any such agreement displaces a question of personal privilege?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That question is not up to me to decide, I will say to the Senator from Georgia. My judgment is that the unanimous-consent agreement can not be set aside by any question of personal privilege or by any other question. That is my judgment about it, but I am not presiding, and, therefore, am not called upon to decide.

I was about to say when interrupted by the Senator from Georgia—and the question he asked me was quite apart from what I had in mind to discuss at the moment—that I had intended to take the floor in response to the observations of the Senator from Wisconsin in regard to the last amendment; but that is the second of his six or seven amendments.

I have no desire whatever to interfere with the right of the Senator, if it be a right as he construes it to be, to present the remainder of his amendments. If I were to take the floor, I should be discussing this matter for perhaps an hour, and at the end of that time he would not have an opportunity to discuss his proposed amendments in accordance with what, as I understand, he construes to be the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the language of the unanimous-consent agreement. In relation to the point that he raises, it is this:

> On said day the Senate will proceed at once to the consideration of amendments that may be proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and will continue such consideration until the hour of 3 o'clock p. m.

It is the Senate that proceeds to the consideration of the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin; and I do not construe that unanimous-consent agreement to mean that the Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor until 3 o'clock, but that the Senate will continue the consideration of the amendments until that time.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I happen to be one of those who were present when the unanimous-consent agreement was first entered into. At that time it was stated that the Senator from Wisconsin had certain amendments that he wanted to present, and that there were two amendments relating to the bonus also to be presented, and the question was how time should be given to present those amendments. I have my own conception about the matter. If I were to take the floor to respond to the Senator from Wisconsin, as I had in mind to do, it would occupy practically the remainder of the time, and several of his amendments could not be presented. I did not construe, when this agreement was entered into, that the Senator from Wisconsin had the right to take the whole five hours, without any right on the part of anybody to respond; but, nevertheless, it has so come about that if I should take this hour to respond, he would not have the privilege of presenting his other amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Certainly.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I think I have taken an undue amount of time, Mr. President. I got somewhat diverted from the line of my argument in discussing the testimony of Secretary Mellon, and I did take more time than I intended to take, and I should like to have the Senator from Indiana feel free to take the floor and go right ahead and occupy as much time as he desires to occupy now. I will take care of myself under the 10-minute rule. I understand that I will have an opportunity to offer my amendments even if they have not been presented before 3 o'clock. I have one amendment which I should like to argue at a little more length than I can under the 10-minute rule, but I feel that I have transgressed so much upon the patience of the Senate that I want to give the Senator from Indiana the opportunity to address himself to the subject.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before the Senator from Wisconsin came on the floor the Senator from Indiana and I were having a colloquy about the construction of the unanimous-consent agreement. I want the Senator from Wisconsin to have all the time that he desires. What I was saying was that under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate would proceed to the consideration of the amendments that were to be offered by the Senator from Wisconsin, and that that, in my opinion, did not give the Senator from Wisconsin the right to occupy the entire five hours.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; and I did not intend to do so, Mr. President.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not think the Senator would want it.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want to do so, and I am perfectly willing to yield all the balance of the time, if it is desired by other Senators.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Of course, everybody in the Senate wants the Senator from Wisconsin to have all the time that is necessary to explain all his amendments.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I will get along under the 10-minute rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to say a word about the amendments and do not desire any time at all for myself. I am simply construing the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am laboring somewhat under the embarrassment of being granted time to discuss an amendment——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I beg to remind Senators on the other side——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Georgia that the Senator from Indiana has the floor.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. I thought he had yielded it.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I understood that I had the floor and that I had yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. That is true.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. For the purpose of trying to work out this controversy. Am I right in that conjecture, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of the opinion that the Senator from Indiana has the floor at the present time.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. Mr. President, the amendment that the Senator discussed has been voted on and rejected, and of course it is not now in order for me with any degree of consistency to discuss that particular amendment, because that is gone. That is one of the amendments to which I particularly desired to address myself, largely responding to what the Senator from Wisconsin had to say about the Secretary of the Treasury and his testimony before the Finance Committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to say so, perhaps it would be more pertinent under another amendment that I will offer later.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I shall be very glad to say something at that time, provided the Senator is going to offer the amendment. My views of this whole question are so entirely different and at such strange extremes from those of the Senator from Wisconsin that they can not be worked out in a discussion of a tax question. These views go down to the very fundamentals of government and reach the foundation stones of our society as organized.

The Senator, in accordance with my views of his understanding of things and of his conception of wealth, is against the accumulation of property by the individual. He is one of those who want by means of governmental agencies to redistribute the wealth of the country, to take it from those who have it and bestow it by the operations of government upon those who have it not; to wrest it from the hands of those who have made it and, through governmental agencies, to bestow it beneficially upon those who have not made it. That is at the basis of his theory of taxation. To that I am fundamentally opposed. I believe in the right of individual initiative. I believe in individual endeavor. I believe that the individual capacity must be developed to the highest possible degree in order to call out all that is highest and best in man.

Of course, there must be a system of taxation in the United States, and we provide for such a system in this bill, as we have in all previous bills, to care adequately for the expenses of government; but I do not believe that by any system of taxation we should undertake to establish a new social condition in the United States whereby the results of a man's initiative and his brain and his energy and his managerial capacity should be wrested from him, in order to have those results bestowed upon others who have not thus accumulated and have not thus managed.

The Senator said that the Secretary of the Treasury had made the statement that men of wealth were resorting to this means and that method for the purpose of evading taxation, and that he had condoned the offense. I desire to disagree entirely with that statement of the views presented by the Secretary of the Treasury to the Finance Committee.

The Secretary of the Treasury was being questioned by our committee, being catechized by the various members, when he was before the committee at our invitation for the purpose of testifying; and the question came up as to whether or not men of wealth, because of the high surtaxes, were largely escaping taxation by investment in tax-exempt securities. In direct response to that question he said yes, they were to a certain extent, but that that was not the means of evasion that was most largely used, in his judgment, by people of wealth; and he proceeded to say that there were other means by which they escaped taxation. They divided their property, or they invested in foreign securities, or they put their money in hiding places, and so forth. There were a dozen or twenty ways—I think Dr. Adams on the stand said there were as many as thirty ways known to the Treasury Department—by which men were seeking to evade taxation, and that was all there was to the proposition; and he said, "They do it within their rights"—that is, within their legal rights—and, of course, when he said that he uttered the truth. A man has a right to divide his property if he wants to. He has a right to put it away in a lock box if he desires to do so. He has a perfect right to invest it in a foreign security if he wants to do so. That is what the Secretary meant, and that is what the Secretary said. The Secretary did not say, and the Secretary did not mean, and I do not think that any possible construction placed upon his terms in fairness can convict him of having said that he was in favor of evasion of taxation by the rich; but those are the words that my good friend the Senator from Wisconsin placed in the mouth of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I placed nothing in the mouth of the Secretary of the Treasury excepting his own testimony. I read his testimony. I deduced certain conclusions from that testimony. If those conclusions are not warranted, they fall of their own weight. I put his testimony into the RECORD. Let that speak for itself.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is precisely what I am trying to do—to have it speak for itself—but my friend——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator is now putting his construction upon that testimony.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. In answer to the construction placed upon it by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; that is all right. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WATSON of Indiana. That is all I am seeking to do. The Senator from Wisconsin placed his construction upon that language. I deny the construction placed upon that language by the Senator from Wisconsin and I place my own construction upon that language. I am explaining how the conversation came about in the committee and why the Secretary was induced to use that language.

It is not conceivable that the Secretary of the Treasury, an official of the Government, would come before a high committee of Congress and advocate the evasion of taxation, and therefore I can not do otherwise than conclude that the construction placed upon the terms by the Senator from Wisconsin was farfetched and lugged in for the purposes of debate.

There are many other phases of the Senator's discussion of this question that I might go into, for, Senators, the whole question of the socialization of industry is involved in this proposition. We have among us men who believe in the Government ownership of railroads and of telegraphs and telephones, all the means for the accumulation of wealth and all the means for the distribution of wealth; and this whole question is wrapped up, not so much in this debate but in the propositions that were announced this morning by the honorable and eloquent Senator from Wisconsin.

I disagree wholly with that view of governmental affairs. I can not believe that this Republic ever can work out its destiny under that sort of a scheme, and I am led to make that response because the Senator, turning about, said, with his usual dramatic force, that we had a democracy in the United States, and that democracy would triumph over all obstacles, and that it would ultimately work out a true democracy under our flag, or language to that effect.

Senators, we do not have a pure democracy in the United States. We never did have such a democracy in the United States. Our fathers never intended to organize such a democracy in the United States, a pure democracy. This is a Republic, based upon certain fundamental principles as everlasting as the eternal.

Our fathers, when they formed this Government, had in view all past governments. They understood at once the strength and the weakness of all forms of government which had been tried theretofore in the history of the world. They saw that in some governments the all-pervading, all-inclusive idea was the mastery of one man, and they understood that that sort of government had gone to pieces because it led to a tyranny.

They saw in many governments in the past, like those in Greece, that the absolute, dominating idea was the supreme will of the people. They saw that that led to a tyranny greater than the tyranny of the one man, because no matter how great the despotism of one individual he can always be overthrown by the great majority; but who can behead the majority, if they do any wrong in their conception of government, and overthrow and destroy all the fundamentals upon which safety and sanity rest; who shall stay the hand of the majority?

So our fathers, in formulating this scheme of government, sought to sail between the Scylla of too great power in the people on the one hand and the Charybdis of too little power in the people on the other hand, and they established a republic, based upon the fundamental principle of a legislative, an executive, and a judicial branch of government, to safeguard always and forever individual right and individual liberty, which is the fourth corner stone of this Republic. If we ever have mass government, we will have overthrown the fundamental principles of a republic and invaded the sovereign rights of the individual, and to that extent, Senators, we would overthrow the policy of the Republic as founded by the fathers and undermine the Constitution upon which our institutions rest.

That is involved in all of these things. I do not mean that it is all wrapped up in this question of taxation; not at all; but my friend from Wisconsin does not stop with discussing the question of taxation. This whole question of socialization is involved in it, and while I want every man to pay his just taxes, while I want every man to make his contribution to the institutions we have established, as we have attempted in this bill to compel him to do by levying sufficient excise taxes and corporation taxes and individual taxes of every kind and variety, nevertheless, I do object to a complete overturning of our theory of government by methods of taxation and by the agencies of the Government.

Dr. Adams is the man, as much as anybody else, who helped to formulate this bill; probably he had more to do with it than anybody else. He lived for many years in Wisconsin, and was a professor in the university at Madison, a great institution. Dr. Adams had some views upon the questions discussed here this morning, which were incorporated in this bill, and nobody knows that any better than my friend from Wisconsin.

In order that I may explain that the Secretary of the Treasury was not the one who formulated this bill, I want to call the attention of the Senate to two remarks made by my friend from Wisconsin, Senator LA FOLLETTE. One was that the Secretary of the Treasury had in effect engrafted his theory of taxation on this bill and was largely responsible for it because of what he said before the Finance Committee, and before the Ways and Means Committee of the House; the other statement was that his advice had not been accepted by the Committee on Ways and Means, and that we had not seen fit to accept it in the Finance Committee, both of which propositions can not be true.

The truth about it is that the Secretary of the Treasury made his recommendations to the Committee on Ways and Means, and that the Ways and Means Committee disagreed with him on the fundamentals he announced. The truth about it is that he came before our committee, and that our committee disagreed with him, very largely, upon the fundamentals he announced, and that our committee took the existing law because it was handed to us by the Ways and Means Committee and the House of Representatives. We did not seek to destroy the work of their hands, but we took the bill they gave to us and we sought to amend it according to our own ideas of taxation, and that is how we come to have this particular bill before us. This bill was not the work of the Secretary of the Treasury, and the general views he announced before the committee were not engrafted upon it. Therefore it does not lie in the mouth of the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator to say that this was the handiwork of the Secretary of the Treasury, and that the Secretary of the Treasury before our committee had sought to condone evasion of taxation on the part of men of great wealth throughout the Republic.

Dr. Adams made this statement in one of his lectures:

> Friends of the income tax, advocates of "liberal democratic finance," should be the first to advocate a change in this situation. To attempt to take in one tax 60 to 70 per cent of the net income, when the taxpayer has, in addition, State and local taxes to pay, is to invite disaster. It must mean eventually the demoralizing and breakdown of the income tax itself. We are hitching a thoroughbred racer to a loaded dray and asking him to run a mile in two minutes. The general property tax has become a byword and a mockery largely because it has been forced to carry burdens heavier than it can bear. Great Britain has stretched income taxation to the uttermost and has set the pace in the use of other radical taxes, but she attempts no such impossible feat as the collection of income taxes in excess of 70 per cent. The British taxes are about four times as heavy as our own upon incomes in the neighborhood of $10,000. At $50,000 they are more than twice as heavy. At $400,000 the rates become about the same, but the British tax stops at something under 60 per cent, while our taxes rise to a corresponding maximum of 73 per cent.

So that when Dr. Adams was uttering those sentiments he was uttering the sentiments we were seeking to incorporate in this bill, and not the sentiments of the Secretary of the Treasury, who stated that if we would drop the surtaxes to 25 per cent, we would reap a larger harvest of revenue and do the least harm to the business of the country, and the sole tenor of the testimony of the Secretary before the committee was as to the method by which we could get the largest revenue for the purpose of operating the Government, and yet do the least injury to business and the least harm to industry in the United States, and the Secretary in that respect was in entire accord and agreement with the fundamental principles announced by every man who testified before the Finance Committee on this provision.

So that when my friend attempts to make us believe—and I do not mean that in an offensive sense at all—that the Secretary of the Treasury was responsible for this bill, and was responsible for the evasion of taxation, and was standing behind any policy that would enable the rich to keep from paying taxes, I do not believe there is a single scintilla of evidence anywhere to warrant his deductions or to sustain his conclusions.

I can not go into this whole question of socialization. That problem will probably come before us when the railroad question is up for discussion, because there will be people here advocating Government ownership of the railroads, and that question will be flung wide open before us for our solution. I only want to say, Senators, that the time is at hand when the line of demarcation will be drawn between safe, sound, fundamental republicanism—and I mean that in the large governmental sense—and the establishment in this country of what we are pleased to call a pure democracy, and, in my judgment, the establishment of, or the attempt even to establish, a pure democracy in this country, means the destruction inevitably of the form of government we enjoy.

Senators, permit me to call attention to the fact that under this form of government, with the institutions which so bless this Republic, we have made greater progress than any other nation in all the recorded history of time, and that there is no reason why the form of government should be changed. It has not failed. This Government is a success, and will continue to be a success as long as it safeguards individual liberty and stands upon the foundation stone of individual right, guarded and guaranteed by the fundamentals of the Constitution.

The Senator may say this is all wide apart from the discussion of taxation. It is all involved in this very proposition, and I think that the Senate can see it without my going further into it.

I am obliged to the Senator. I did not care to take his time. I had no idea of making any remarks when I came into the Senate Chamber this morning, and would not have done so had not a colloquy arisen in which my friend from Wisconsin misconstrued, unintentionally, a private remark made in the rear of the Chamber, in which, of course, there was nothing personal, because I never indulge in personalities, either in private conversation or public speech; I do not believe in that sort of thing. But that led the Senator to make certain remarks to me that I felt impelled to answer, not as to the personal side of it at all, because I will talk that out with him personally, but as to the position he had announced, and as to the policies he had espoused and as to the things he had said with reference to the Secretary of the Treasury, and I feel that in my weak way, without previous preparation or arrangement, I have at least attempted to place the proper construction upon the language of this great public official.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, I have listened with much pleasure to the unique address of the accomplished orator, the senior Senator from Indiana. It is exceedingly gratifying to hear that sort of a sentiment from the other side of the Chamber. It is music to my ears to hear a stalwart of the stalwarts talk of a return to the Constitution, and pay a tribute to personal liberty. It fills my weary and dispairing heart with hope to know that there still lingers among Senators on the other side a memory of the time when the rights of men were sacred, when about them were concentric and invulnerable circles, like so many barricades against the insidious approach of tyranny and oppression.

Local self-government, State sovereignty, sir, are but means to an end. The great dream of Jefferson, whose spirit of liberty is the Declaration of Independence, whose conception of maintaining that independence is the organic form of the Constitution itself, the summum bonum, the ultimate end, the great thing for which he sought, for which he dreamed and wrought, the thing for which men were willing to die in their day was the personal security, the inviolate liberty, of the individual. The authority vested in the country, the authority vested in the State, the strict delegation of power to the Government itself, were but means of maintaining inviolate the independence of the individual. Within this circle, so long as he did not invade the rights of his neighbor, he was absolutely secure from any Government—State or Federal—to worship God as he pleased, to speak and to act as he pleased, to live his own life, master of his own fate. his own appetites, his own habits.

I agree with the Senator from Indiana, sir, that whenever we depart from these constitutional limitations we do not drift into a democracy. The democracies of which we read were designed for small communities, for the petty States and cities, ancient Greece, where there was a limited electorate, all of the same class, and with the same customs and aspirations. Such a democracy here is impossible. When you have destroyed the form of this government, Mr. President, you have not established a democracy. You have established a mobocracy, worse, a thousand times worse, than any tyranny ancient or modern. No Nero, no Caligula, no kaiser, no czar, no sultan, no Assyrian king, no oriental emperor—power has never been conferred so absolutely upon any creature, no matter how debased or cruel, as to enable him to exert such an enormous influence not only for the enslavement but for the degradation of the masses, as to place imperial power, unrestrained power, with no constitutional limitation, in the hands of a mob or of a faction.

And yet, Mr. President, to-day, with a sad heart I see these precious liberties broken and shattered by a determined trend toward centralization of power, Federal aggression, and Federal usurpation. I see the last vestige of State rights and State sovereignty gone. I see the individual stripped of admittedly constitutional rights. I see his home no longer sacred, his person no longer secure. I see sleuths and spies and inspectors authorized by law, if you call it law—authorized by a thing you mean to make a statute—to run their hands over the bodies of women in search of contraband goods, without an affidavit, without a charge. Your home and mine, sirs, to-day are about to be invaded by men who have no other authority than their own curiosity or their own evil suspicions. These great guaranties of the Constitution are broken and shattered. O tempora, O mores! Ye gods, can we believe it!

In the midst of the ruin, degradation, and destruction of personal liberty a voice is raised in the wilderness, the voice of the Senator from Indiana; and what does it plead for? For personal liberty? No. He has not said a word for it. He has pleaded for the sanctity not of persons but of property. "Search my home, run through my body, invade the most sacred sanctuary, but do not ask me about my bonds." Destroy personal liberty but save the purse. The Senator from Indiana has pleaded for the sanctity of the purse, not of the person. He is pleading for the privacy and security not of men but of millions.

I welcome the Senator from Indiana to constitutional government. I welcome him to the camp of the liberals. I hope he will display courage equal to his talents, and that I shortly may hear him speak in favor of the maintenance of the Constitution and against its shameless and ruthless invasion.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am quite willing to permit the remarks which I submitted in support of my amendment and the statement which the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] has just made to stand without further comment.

I was contending for the payment of taxes according to the ability of the taxpayer to pay, but the Senator from Indiana evidently wishes to divert the issue from that which was plainly raised by my amendment and by the remarks which I submitted in its support to other issues which I shall be very pleased to discuss with him, when the time comes, upon this floor.

I quoted Secretary Mellon's testimony this morning because it bore directly upon the amendment which was pending before the Senate. I referred to the Secretary's ideas of what is a proper fiscal system, his ideas as expounded before the Committee on Finance, and I quoted his exact words in support of my statement as to what is his position.

Now, Mr. President, I wish to bring to the attention of the Senate another amendment within the time that has been allotted for the consideration of these amendments, and I should like, if possible, to reach a vote upon this amendment before the hour of 3 o'clock. In so far as other amendments that I have to offer are concerned, I think under the terms of the unanimous-consent agreement they will all be in order under the 10-minute rule; at least, I shall so contend.

I desire now to propose an amendment to the estate-tax provision of the bill, and therefore ask at the outset that the vote by which section 401, page 148, was agreed to may be, by unanimous consent, reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin? If not, the vote by which the section was adopted will be considered as having been reconsidered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I would like right at this point to reserve for a vote in the Senate the amendment upon which

I just had a vote—that is, the amendment for publicity of tax returns. I would like to have that noted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such reservation is not necessary. The Senator has that right.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The vote by which section 401 was adopted having been reconsidered, I now offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be reported.

The READING CLERK. Strike out all the matter beginning on page 146, line 22, down to and including line 17, page 148, and insert the following:

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I would like to inquire whether, under the unanimous-consent agreement, all of the amendments of the Senator from Wisconsin will be voted on before 3 o'clock?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. No; I shall offer the others under the 10-minute rule. I am confident that under the provisions of the unanimous-consent agreement I can offer those amendments at any time after the bonus provision is out of the way, so there will be ample opportunity to offer the other amendments. They are very important and are a part of this whole plan.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I had intended to discuss this question as presented in the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, but I realize there is very little time left in which to do that, and probably I could add nothing of any particular importance to the discussion.

I have been firmly convinced for many years that a proper inheritance tax was the best and the fairest means of raising revenue. I do not mean by that a tax which will destroy the estate. Of course there is no vested right in an inheritance. It is a right created by statute, and the large fortunes which are handed down for years and years, in trust and otherwise, are something of an economic menace. I am not ready to subscribe to the doctrine that we should distribute wealth by taxation, but if the handing down of great fortunes could be checked, and at the same time we could perform a great economic public good, injuring no one, in fact, and acquiring revenue for the Government, it would seem to me a very desirable form of taxation.

I remember Senator Dolliver used to say so many times that if you had a boy and $100,000 you should keep them widely separated; but now some estates in this country have grown to such figures that $100,000 seems an insignificant amount.

This form of taxation has been indorsed, not by idealists and theorists merely but by very practical men.

I desire to put into the RECORD the words of Andrew Carnegie, who once said:

Of all forms of taxation this seems the wisest.

Referring to inheritance taxes.

Theodore Roosevelt once said:

I feel that we shall ultimately have to consider the adoption of some such scheme as that of a progressive tax on fortunes beyond a certain amount, either given in life or bequeathed beyond death.

Mr. William K. Vanderbilt, in an interview in the New York Times in 1905—and Mr. Vanderbilt's interviews were very rare—said:

My life was never destined to be quite happy. It was along lines which I could foresee almost from earliest childhood. It has left me with nothing to hope for, with nothing definite to seek or strive for. Inherited wealth is a big handicap to happiness. It is as certain death to ambition as cocaine is to morality. If a man makes money, no matter how much, he finds a certain happiness in its possession, for in the desire to increase his business he has constant use for it, but the man who inherits it has none of this. The first satisfaction and the greatest help in building the foundation of a fortune is denied him. He must labor, if he does labor, simply to add to an oversufficiency.

So that men of great wealth have indorsed this form of taxation. We have tried it in this country, Mr. President, with varying success. If we had had on our statute books an inheritance tax law imposing a tax equal to that of France or Great Britain, instead of raising last year $154,000,000, to which the Senator from Wisconsin has referred, we would have raised over $600,000,000. Our national wealth is three to five times that of Great Britain and three and one-half times that of France.

Some time ago the Secretary of the Treasury estimated that we would require something like four and a half billion dollars to run the Government the next year, and later reduced that by $500,000,000. As the Senator from Wisconsin has pointed out, in the last fiscal year we raised through this tax about $154,000,000. France raised through her inheritance tax $179,000,000. Great Britain raised $231,000,000.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Great Britain has about half the population of the United States.

Mr. KENYON. And we have about three times her wealth.

Mr. KING. Of course, our States have inheritance tax laws, and they have raised many, many millions.

Mr. KENYON. I am coming to that. Last year our States raised about $58,000,000, and adding that to the $154,000,000 the Government raised it gives approximately $212,000,000 of inheritance taxes collected last year. That, taking the State returns and the Federal Government returns, is less than was raised by Great Britain.

The bill as it now stands, under the amendment adopted, provides for a 50 per cent tax on estates of $100,000,000. That will amount to absolutely nothing, in my judgment, unless the Senator from Wisconsin has some amendments which he will suggest which will work that out, because since 1916, when this law was passed, not a single net estate of over a hundred million dollars has gone through the Treasury Department. There have been, I think, two gross estates over that amount, but when whittled down $89,000,000 was the highest amount collected. France, in handling this subject, taxes gifts somewhat along the line suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin.

I see that my time is up. I am sorry I have not more time, Mr. President; but I realize the time is up, and we want a vote.

I ask leave to place in the RECORD tables showing the working out of the French law and the British law, and also a statement of the taxes collected in the various States, unless the Senator from Wisconsin is going to put the same matter in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be copied in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the reading clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. McCORMICK], who is absent from the Chamber on account of a death in his family. As I am unable to obtain a transfer, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], who is unavoidably absent. I am informed that if he were present he would vote "nay" upon the pending proposition. I am therefore at liberty to vote, as I intend to vote the same way. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HARRISON. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from West Virgina [Mr. ELKINS] to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

INTERNATIONAL CONFERENCE ON LIMITATION OF ARMAMENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is in receipt of a communication, which the Secreary will read.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 4, 1921.

THE VICE PRESIDENT,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to invite the Members of the Senate to the opening session of the International Conference on the Limitation of Armament, at Memorial Continental Hall, on Saturday, November 12, at 10.30 a. m.

An entire section has been reserved for the seating of the Members of the Senate, to which access may be had through a special entrance on the north side of the building.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. HUGHES.

Mr. LODGE. It is needless to have the communication go through the form of reference to a committee, and I move that the Senate accept the invitation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves that the Senate accept the invitation.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. In this connection will the Senator state whether the Senate will attend in a body or will tickets be issued?

Mr. LODGE. I am not sure about the details. The matter will be arranged with the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate. I do not know what arrangement will be made.

Mr. FLETCHER. The question is whether the Senate is expected to attend in a body.

Mr. LODGE. I think that would be within the spirit of the invitation.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am about to send to the desk an amendment to the bill which, because it incorporates in full the soldiers' bonus bill as reported to the Senate, is very long. It contains no new matter, a part of the amendment being the clauses of the law as the law now exists with reference to the tax upon excess profits, the provision, indeed, as reported, with the exception that the excess-profits taxes are continued for the year 1922 and each year thereafter. The whole of the amendment is composed of that law, with which the Senate is perfectly familiar, and the bonus bill, which was discussed on the floor of the Senate for something like a week or ten days.

The amendment is printed and is as I offered it with the exception that I have renumbered the sections. I see no reason, therefore, for taking the time of the Senate to read the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the reading may be waived and that the amendment may be considered as having been read in the usual manner.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Let it appear in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. I ask that the amendment be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is so ordered.

Mr. REED's amendment is as follows:

Insert after line 21, page 145, two new sections, to be known as sections ———.

SEC. —. That when used in this section the terms "taxable year," "fiscal year," "personal-service corporation," "paid or accrued," and "dividends" shall have the same meaning as provided for the purposes of income tax in sections 200 and 201.

PART II.—IMPOSITION OF TAX.

SEC. —. (A) That in lieu of the tax imposed by Title III of the revenue act of 1918, but in addition to the other taxes imposed by this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid for the calendar year 1922, and each year thereafter, upon the net income of every corporation (except corporations taxable under subdivision (C) of this section), a tax equal to the sum of the following:

FIRST BRACKET.

Twenty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under section 312) and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

SECOND BRACKET.

Forty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital.

The moneys derived from such taxes shall constitute a separate fund and shall be devoted, so far as necessary, to pay and discharge the obligations created by paragraph (B) of this amendment.

(B) TITLE I.—GENERAL PROVISIONS.

DEFINITIONS.

(1) This paragraph may be cited as the "World War adjusted compensation paragraph."

(2) As used in this paragraph—

The term "veteran" includes any individual, a member of the military or naval forces of the United States at any time after April 5, 1917, and before November 12, 1918; but does not include (1) any individual at any time during such period or thereafter separated from such forces under other than honorable conditions, (2) any conscientious objector who performed no military duty whatever or refused to wear the uniform, or (3) any alien at any time during such period or thereafter discharged from the military or naval forces on account of his alienage; and

The term "adjusted service pay" means the amount of the payment to which the veteran would be entitled under the provisions of Title II of paragraph (B).

OPTIONAL PLANS.

(3) Each veteran shall have the right to avail himself of any one, but only one, of the following plans:

(4) To receive "adjusted service pay," as provided in Title II of paragraph (B);

(5) To receive an "adjusted service certificate," as provided in Title III of paragraph (B);

(6) To receive "vocational training aid," as provided in Title IV of paragraph (B);

(7) To receive "farm or home aid," as provided in Title V of paragraph (B); or

(8) To receive "land settlement aid," as provided in Title VI of paragraph (B).

APPLICATION BY VETERAN.

(9) The veteran's choice among the plans enumerated in section 3 shall be made by application filed with the Secretary of War, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the military forces; or with the Secretary of the Navy, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the naval forces.

Such application may be made at any time after the passage and approval of this paragraph.

An application shall be made (1) personally by the veteran, or (2) in case physical or mental incapacity or absence from the continental United States prevents the making of a personal application, then by such representative of the veteran and in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe. An application made by a representative other than one required by any such regulation shall be held void.

The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly make any regulations necessary to the efficient administration of the provisions of this section.

PROOF OF VETERAN'S CHOICE OF PLAN.

(10) As soon as practicable after the receipt of a valid application, the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as the case may be, shall transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury, if the veteran has chosen an adjusted service certificate, or to the Federal Board for Vocational Education if the veteran has chosen vocational training aid, or to the Secretary of the Interior if the veteran has chosen farm or home aid, or land-settlement aid, a certificate setting forth:

(11) That the applicant is a veteran;

(12) His name and address;

(13) The plan chosen; and

(14) The amount of adjusted service pay to which he would be entitled if he had chosen that plan.

(15) Upon receipt of such certificate, the officer or board to which it is transmitted shall proceed to extend to the veteran the benefits conferred by the plan chosen, at the time, in the manner, and under the conditions provided for in the title of this paragraph covering such plan.

PUBLICITY.

(16) The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall, as soon as practicable after the passage and approval of this act, jointly prepare and publish a pamphlet or pamphlets containing a digest and explanation of the provisions of this paragraph, accompanied by such statements as to the comparative advantages of each of the plans enumerated in section 3, as may be of assistance to veterans in making their choice among such plans; and shall from time to time thereafter jointly prepare and publish such additional or supplementary information as may be found necessary.

(17) The officer or board having charge of the administration of any plan or part thereof enumerated in section 3 shall transmit to the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy as soon as practicable after the passage and approval of this act full information and explanations as to the matters of which such officer or board has charge, which shall be considered by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy in preparing the publications referred to in subdivision (a).

(18) The publications provided for in subdivision (a) shall be distributed in such manner as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy may determine to be most effective to inform veterans of their rights under this paragraph.

STATISTICS.

(19) Immediately upon the passage of this act the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall ascertain the individuals who are veterans as defined in section 2, and, as to each veteran, the number of days of overseas service and of home service, as defined in section 12, for which he is entitled to receive adjusted service pay; and their decisions shall not be subject to review by the accounting officers of the Treasury.

ADMINISTRATIVE REGULATIONS.

(20) Any officer or board charged with the administration of any plan under this paragraph, or of any part thereof, shall make such regulations, not inconsistent with this paragraph, as may be necessary to the efficient administration of the matter of which such officer or board has charge.

DEDUCTION OF OVERPAYMENTS.

(21) After computing the amount of payment to be made to the veteran under any one of the plans enumerated in section 3, or after using his adjusted service pay as the basis for any computation under this paragraph, there shall be deducted from the amount thus obtained the amount of any overpayment previously made in respect to the service of the veteran in the military or naval forces.

(22) Any officer or board charged with the administration of any plan under this paragraph, or of any part thereof, shall make a full report to Congress on the first Monday of December of each year.

(23) No sum payable under this paragraph to a veteran, or to his estate, or to any beneficiary named under Title III, shall be subject to attachment, levy, or seizure under any legal or equitable process.

TITLE II.—ADJUSTED SERVICE PAY.

(24) As used in this title of paragraph (B)—

The term "overseas service" means service on shore in Europe or Asia, exclusive of China, Japan, and the Philippine Islands; and service afloat, including the period from the date of embarkation for such service to the date of disembarkation on return from such service, both dates inclusive; and

The term "home service" means all service not overseas service.

(25) There shall be paid to any veteran, upon application in accordance with the provisions of section 4 and in addition to any other amounts due him in pursuance of law, the following sums for each day of active service, in excess of 60 days, in the military or naval forces of the United States after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, as shown by the service or other record of the veteran: $1.25 for each day of overseas service and $1 for each day of home service; but the amount payable to a veteran who performed no overseas service shall not exceed $500, and the amount payable to a veteran who performed any overseas service shall not exceed $625.

(26) (a) No such payment shall be made to—

(1) Any commissioned officer above the grade of captain in the Army or Marine Corps, lieutenant in the Navy, first lieutenant or first lieutenant of engineers in the Coast Guard, or passed assistant surgeon in the Public Health Service, or having the pay and allowances, if not the rank, of any officer superior in rank to any of such grades—in each case for the period of service as such;

(2) Any individual holding a permanent or provisional commission or permanent or acting warrant in any branch of the military or naval forces, for the period of service under such commission or warrant after the accrual of the right to pay thereunder;

(3) Any civilian officer or employee of any branch of the military or naval forces, contract surgeon, cadet of the United States Military Academy, midshipman, cadet of the Coast Guard, member of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps, member of the Students' Army Training Corps (except an enlisted man detailed thereto), member of the United States Guards, member of a development battalion (except an officer or enlisted man detailed thereto), member of the United States Disciplinary Barracks Guard, Philippine Scout, member of the Philippine Guard, member of the Philippine Constabulary, member of the Porto Rico Regiment of Infantry, member of the National Guard of Hawaii, member of the insular force of the Navy, member of the Samoan native guard and band of the Navy, or Indian Scout—in each case for the period of service as such;

(4) Any individual entering the military or naval forces after November 11, 1918—for any period after such entrance;

(5) Any individual originally entering the service for special or limited service only—for the period of such special or limited service not overseas service;

(6) Any individual performing home service not with troops and receiving commutation of quarters or of subsistence—for the period of such service;

(7) Any member of the Public Health Service—for any period during which he was not detailed for duty with the Army or the Navy;

(8) Any individual granted a farm or industrial furlough—for the period of such furlough;

(9) Any individual detailed for work on roads or other highway construction or repair work—for the period during which his pay was equalized to conform to the compensation paid to civilian employees in the same or like employment, pursuant to the provisions of section 9 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919;

(10) Any individual who has been absent from duty on account of disease resulting from his own intemperate use of drugs or alcoholic liquors or from other misconduct—for the period of such absence; or

(11) Any individual who has been absent without proper authority for more than one day or in confinement under sentence or awaiting trial and disposition of his case, if the trial resulted in conviction—for the period of such absence or confinement.

(b) The periods referred to in paragraphs (5) and (6) of subdivision (a) may be included in the case of any individual if and to the extent that the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy jointly find that such service subjected such individual to exceptional hazard. A full statement of all action under this subdivision shall be included in the reports of the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy required by section 10.

(c) In computing the payments to any veteran under this title effect shall be given to all paragraphs of subdivision (a) which are applicable.

(d) If part of the service is overseas service and part is home service, the home service shall first be used in computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 202.

(e) For the purpose of computing the 60 days' period referred to in section 13, any period of service after April 5, 1917, and before July 1, 1919, in the military or naval forces in any capacity may be included, notwithstanding payment for such period, or a part thereof, is prohibited under the provisions of subdivision (a) of this section, except that the periods referred to in paragraphs (2), (3), and (4) of subdivision (a) shall not be included.

(f) For the purpose of section 13, in the case of members of the National Guard or of the National Guard Reserve called into service by the proclamation of the President dated July 3, 1917, the time of service between the date of call into the service as specified in such proclamation and August 5, 1917, both dates inclusive, shall be deemed to be active service in the military or naval forces of the United States.

(27) (a) The payments authorized by the provisions of this title shall be made in installments, beginning on the 1st day of July or January next succeeding the fifteenth day after the date of filing the application, but not before July 1, 1922, as follows: (1) If the total amount payable is $500 or over, in 10 equal quarterly installments; and (2) if the total amount payable is less than $500, in quarterly installments of $50; except that any installment necessary to complete the payments may be less than $50.

(b) If before the completion of the installment payments the veteran is separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions, or is discharged therefrom on account of his alienage, no further installments shall be paid. Payment shall be made by the Secretary of War if the veteran is serving in, or his last service was with, the military forces; and by the Secretary of the Navy, if he is serving in, or his last service was with, the naval forces.

(28) If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 4 for adjusted service pay and before receiving all the installment payments, the payments authorized by the provisions of this title shall be made to his estate.

(29) No right to adjusted service pay under the provisions of this title shall be assignable or serve as security for any loan. Any assignment or loan made in violation of the provisions of this section shall be held void. The Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall not pay the amount of adjusted service pay to any person other than the veteran or his estate or such representative of the veteran as the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy shall jointly by regulation prescribe.

TITLE III.—ADJUSTED SERVICE CERTIFICATES.

(30) The Secretary of the Treasury, upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 5, is hereby directed to issue without cost to the veteran designated therein an adjusted service certificate (hereinafter in this title referred to as a "certificate") of a face value equal to the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran increased by 40 per cent, plus (2) interest thereon for 20 years at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually (such amount being approximately equal to 3.38 times the adjusted service pay of the veteran). The certificate and all rights conferred under the provisions of this title shall take effect as of the 1st day of July or January next succeeding the date of filing the application, but not before July 1, 1922. The veteran shall name the beneficiary of the certificate and may from time to time, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, alter such beneficiary. The amount of the face value of the certificate shall be payable (1) to the veteran 20 years after it becomes effective, or (2) upon the death of the veteran prior thereto, to the beneficiary named; except that if such beneficiary dies before the veteran and no new beneficiary is named, or if the beneficiary in the first instance has not yet been named, the amount of the certificate shall be paid to the estate of the veteran.

(31) There is hereby established in the Treasury a revolving fund to be known as the "adjusted service certificate loan fund" (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "fund"). The Postmaster General is authorized to make loans out of such fund upon the certificate of any veteran. The amount of such loans to any one veteran outstanding at any one time shall not exceed—

(a) If the loan is made during the third to fifth years, inclusive, after the certificate becomes effective, 90 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran plus (2) interest thereon from the date the certificate becomes effective to the time of the making of the loan at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually, or

(b) If the loan is made during the sixth to twentieth years, inclusive, after the certificate becomes effective, 80 per cent of the sum of (1) the adjusted service pay of the veteran increased by 40 per cent, plus (2) interest thereon from the date the certificate becomes effective, to the time of the making of the loan, at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, compounded annually.

(32) Moneys in the fund shall be available to make all loans upon certificates. The Postmaster General is hereby authorized to set aside out of the fund such reserve moneys as may be required to make such loans, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to invest the remainder of the moneys in the fund in interest-bearing obligations of the United States. Such obligations may at the discretion of the Secretary be sold and the proceeds reinvested in other interest-bearing obligations of the United States, and shall be sold and the proceeds made available for the purposes of the fund, whenever the Postmaster General certifies that in his opinion further amounts are required for the purposes of the fund. Any moneys in such fund not deemed necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purposes of this title shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

(33) No loan shall be made upon any certificate within two years after the certificate becomes effective. Application for loans may be made to any postmaster of a first, second, or third class post office. The veteran shall give a note for the repayment of the loan upon an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual installments sufficient to cover (1) interest on the unpaid principal at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum, and (2) such amount of the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period not exceeding the life of the certificate. The veteran may, however, pay any or all installments of the principal previous to their due date. The Postmaster General shall by regulation prescribe the form of application and the duration, number, and amount of installments, and such other conditions as he deems advisable, of the loan. All payments in respect to the loan shall be made through a first, second, or third class post office. Any moneys received for the repayment of the loan shall be covered into the fund. Whenever the Postmaster General finds that the borrower is in arrears for more than two years in his installments upon the note or has violated any other conditions thereof he shall certify such fact to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon declare the certificate of the borrower to be forfeited.

(34) No certificate issued or right conferred under the provisions of this title shall be negotiable or assignable or serve as security for a loan other than one made under the provisions of section 19. Any loan made in violation of any provision of this section shall be held void. Whenever the Secretary of the Treasury finds that any such certificate or right has been negotiated or assigned, or has served as security, in violation of a provision of this section, the rights of the veteran under this title shall be forfeited.

(35) In the case of the death of the borrower or the forfeiture of his certificate or rights under this title any loan made upon the certificate and the note in respect thereto shall be deemed canceled. The Secretary of the Treasury shall thereupon reimburse the Postmaster General for all unpaid installments upon any canceled loan; and in case such loan has been canceled as a result of the death of the borrower the Secretary of the Treasury shall deduct the amount of such reimbursement from the amount of the face value of the certificate in respect to which the loan is made.

(36) Any certificate issued under the provisions of this title shall have printed upon its face the conditions and terms upon which it is issued and to which it is subject.

(37) If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 4 and before the certificate becomes effective, the amount of the adjusted service pay of the veteran shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to his estate.

TITLE IV.—VOCATIONAL TRAINING AID.

(38) The Federal Board for Vocational Education (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "board") upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 5, is hereby directed to pay to the veteran designated therein (if he is not receiving the benefits of the vocational rehabilitation act, as amended) the sum of $1.75 for each day of his attendance (on or after January 1, 1922), on a course of vocational training previously approved by the board as suitable for such veteran. Such payment shall be made without deduction for Sundays, holidays, or vacations not exceeding two weeks in duration, or for absence for other cause which the board deems justifiable; but the total payment shall not exceed 140 per cent of the amount of adjusted service pay which the veteran would be entitled to receive if he had chosen that plan.

Payments under this section shall be made monthly, or at more frequent intervals, as the board may determine generally or in special cases.

(39) The board shall establish such regulations as will insure the regular attendance of the veteran on his course of training, and no sum or sums shall be payable under this title unless the board has been furnished proof of such regular attendance. For each day of unjustifiable absence the veteran shall forfeit the sum payable for that day, and shall receive no reimbursement for it in any other form.

(40) (a) If the payment under section 26 plus the amounts forfeited under section 27 is less than 140 per cent of the adjusted service pay, either by reason of the duration of the course approved, or by reason of the veteran's discontinuing, with the approval of the board, his attendance on his course of training, he shall be entitled to receive an amount equal to the difference between (1) his adjusted service pay and (2) that proportion thereof which the payments made or accrued under section 26 plus the amounts forfeited under section 27 bear to 140 per cent of his adjusted service pay: Provided, That from the amount thus computed there shall be deducted an amount equal to the sums forfeited under section 27.

(b) Such amount shall be paid to him by the board in such installments and at such times as will place him upon the same basis as if he had originally chosen to receive adjusted service pay as provided in Title II.

(41) If before the completion of the payments under this title the veteran is separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions, or is discharged therefrom on account of his alienage, no further payments shall be made under this title.

(42) (a) If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 4 and before any payments have been made or have accrued under this title, the amount of the adjusted service pay of the veteran shall be paid by the board to his estate.

(b) If the veteran dies, after the course of training has begun, his estate shall be paid by the board the same amount as would have been paid to the veteran under subdivision (a) of section 28, treating for such purposes the date of his death as the date of discontinuance of attendance on his course of training.

(c) The amounts payable under this section shall be payable in the same manner as provided in subdivision (b) of section 28.

(43) (a) The board is hereby authorized to cooperate with State boards for vocational education in such manner as will secure their assistance in the approval of courses of training for veterans, and other assistance in carrying out the provisions of this title.

(b) Whenever any State provides funds for assistance to veterans in attendance upon approved courses or provides for free tuition in approved educational institutions, the board is authorized and directed to cooperate with the State board for vocational education of such State in securing the maximum educational opportunities to veterans entitled to the benefits of this title.

TITLE V.—FARM OR HOME AID.

(44) The Secretary of the Interior, upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 5, is hereby directed, on or after July 1, 1922, to pay to the veteran designated therein, in one payment or in installments, an amount equal to his adjusted service pay increased by 40 per cent.

Such payment shall be made for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of enabling the veteran to make improvements on a city or suburban home, or a farm not selected under Title VI, or to purchase or make payments on such a home or farm.

(45) No such payment shall be made unless and until the Secretary of the Interior has approved the purpose for which it is desired by the veteran, and has suitable assurance that the money will be expended for such purpose. The Secretary of the Interior may, at the option of the veteran, or on his own motion, make the payment directly to the vendor or other person to whom such payment is due from the veteran.

(46) For the purpose of enabling him to pass upon the desirability of the investment he may make use of the services of land bank appraisers of the Federal Farm Loan Board, to be designated by such board.

(47) (a) If the veteran dies, after making application in accordance with the provisions of section 4 for farm or home aid and before a contract has been entered into with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the amount of his adjusted service pay shall be paid by the Secretary of the Interior to the estate of the veteran in such installments and at such times as will place the beneficiaries thereof upon the same basis as the veteran would have been if he had originally chosen to receive adjusted service pay as provided in Title II, but no such payment shall be made if the veteran has been separated from the military or naval forces under other than honorable conditions or discharged therefrom on account of his alienage.

(b) If before the veteran's death a contract has been entered into with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and payments under this title on such contract are still due, such payments shall be made by the Secretary of the Interior to the vendor or other person to whom such payments are due from the veteran.

TITLE VI.—LAND SETTLEMENT.

(48) On the opening of public or Indian lands to entry, or the restoration to entry of public lands theretofore withdrawn from entry, such opening or restoration shall, in the order therefor, provide for a period of not less than 60 days before the general opening of such lands to disposal, in which period veterans who have chosen the benefits of this title shall have a preferred right of entry under the homestead or desert land laws, if qualified thereunder, except as against prior existing valid settlement rights and as against preference rights conferred by existing laws or equitable claims subject to allowance and confirmation.

Such preference right for such period shall also be accorded on all reclamation projects now in existence or hereafter established, whether such reclamation is made by irrigation, drainage, or other method.

Upon certification from the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, as provided in section 5, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, there shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, on or after January 1, 1922, to the veteran designated therein, in one payment or in installments an amount equal to his adjusted service pay increased by 40 per cent. Such payment shall be made for the purpose, and only for the purpose, of enabling the veteran to make payments in connection with the lands as to which preference has been given under this section, or for the improvement of any such land, and shall be made only if the Secretary of the Interior has suitable assurance that the money will be expended for such purpose.

TITLE VII.—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

(49) The officers and boards having charge of the administration of any of the provisions of this paragraph are authorized to appoint such officers, employees, and agents in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, and to make such expenditures for rent, furniture, office equipment, printing, binding, telegrams, telephone, law books, books of reference, stationery, motor-propelled vehicles or trucks used for official purposes, traveling expenses and per diem, in lieu of subsistence, at not exceeding $4 for officers, agents, and other employees, for the purchase of reports and materials for publications, and for other contingent and miscellaneous expenses, as may be necessary efficiently to execute the purposes of this paragraph and as may be provided for by the Congress from time to time. With the exception of such special experts as may be found necessary for the conduct of the work, all such appointments shall be made subject to the civil-service laws, and preference shall, so far as practicable, be given to veterans.

(50) Whoever knowingly makes any false or fraudulent statement of a material fact in any application, certificate, or document made under the provisions of Title I, II, III, IV, V, or VI of this paragraph or of any regulation made under any such title, shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned not more than five years, or both.

(51) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of the funds created by paragraph (A) such amount as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this paragraph: Provided, That if at any time the funds collected under the provisions of section 300 and section 301, paragraph (A) as amended, are not sufficient to carry out the provisions of this act and additional funds to fully carry out said provisions are not appropriated, the funds created under said sections shall be held by the Secretary of the Treasury until a sufficient amount has accumulated to discharge a class of unpaid obligations, and payments by classes shall be made in the order of maturity. The obligations created by this paragraph shall be postponed until sufficient moneys have accumulated as aforesaid.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, three years ago next Friday sirens were screaming, bells were ringing, and a mighty shout broke from the throats of millions of American citizens in a wonderful diapason of joy. The news had been received that the armistice was signed. Battle flags upon the front were furled. The heroic bugles of war were sounding the notes of peace. Carnage had ceased. The ache in the hearts of millions of American mothers gave place to a feeling of infinite contentment and of unspeakable pleasure.

Thus the people of this country and of the world united their voices in a wild shout of praise. Arms were extended toward the sea waiting for the returning heroes who had fought so well and had accomplished such wonderful results. They came to us, these soldiers of the war, some of them being led by the hand, staring through sightless eyes that could never see the light again; some of them hobbling upon crutches; some of them with empty sleeves, many—oh, so many—with hollow cheeks and sunken eyes and drooping shoulders, the victims of deadly gases and of deadly disease. They had been "over yonder," some of them, for nearly two years of time. They had endured the agony of parting from mothers and loved ones. They had slept on frozen ground and in the mud. They had stood shoulder deep in freezing water. They had been through hospitals of pain and had felt the surgeon's knife as it slithered through the flesh. They had marched forward with a courage that has never been equaled in all the annals of the heroic past.

Horatius at the bridge was not comparable in his courage with the soldier flyer who, 10,000 feet above the earth in the gray twilight, fought it out to the death with the enemies of his country. The Roman soldier who stood, foot to foot, with short spear and firm-held shield, was required to face nothing so horrible as the poison that crept into the lungs and by slow and insidious processes destroyed life.

This was the service rendered. Seventy-five thousand of those soldiers lay down to their final resting place; their shroud was the trampled and blood-stained dust of a foreign land. But millions of those who left their habitations and their positions in life, who received a mere pittance that did not supply them with the ordinary little necessities that men must have, who sacrificed their time, their health, and shortened, I apprehend, by many months or years their period of life upon this earth—these men came back, amidst the plaudits of a grateful people, in too many instances, to find their positions gone. Others who had remained at home had seized upon the situation and had occupied the offices they had been obliged to vacate, the homes in which many of them had lived, the employments in which they had earned their livings. So they turned from the task of war to the almost equally difficult task of peace.

Mr. President, while they were gone, while they were spending their energies, people at home were accumulating money. While the soldier was abroad draining his veins, many of the people at home were filling their pockets. When these men returned they found they were obliged, out of the pitiful dole handed to them with their discharge papers, to buy their civilian clothes in a market controlled in some way, either by laws of finance or by financiers, so that they were obliged to pay a tribute to a profiteer of from 100 or 200 or 300 per cent above the normal price of the articles they were purchasing. The $25 ready-made suit of clothes had become a $75 suit; the $50 suit had become a $125 suit of clothes; the $5 pair of shoes had become a $15 pair of shoes; the room they had rented for $20 a month had become a $40 to $50 "apartment." Wealth had been accumulated at a rate astounding even to the students of fortunes accumulated during wars. Let me give you, for it has a direct bearing upon this question, a few figures from a report filed with the House of Representatives, the accuracy of which I have never heard disputed.

In 1917 the corporations then in existence in the United States were capitalized at $25,000,000,000. At the present time those identical corporations have passed over to surplus and increased their capital by the enormous sum of $10,000,000,000. Since that time new corporations have been formed which are capitalized at $5,000,000,000.

In spite of the large dividends distributed the capitalization of the corporations of the United States has increased in less than three years from $25,000,000,000 to $40,000,000,000, and this increase of $15,000,000,000 is entirely due to the war.

Last year one individual in the United States reported an income of $34,000,000; there are two men in the United States whose income last year was over $16,000,000 each; there are five men in the United States whose income last year was over $5,000,000 apiece. In 1914 there were 60 men in the United States whose annual income was over $1,000,000 each. Last year there were 248 men in the United States whose incomes were over $1,000,000 each. In 1914 there were 114 men in the United States whose incomes were between $500,000 and $1,000,000; last year there were 405 men in the United States whose incomes reached that enormous amount. In 1914 there were 147 men in the United States whose incomes were between $400,000 and $500,000. To-day there are 400 men enjoying that large income.

In 1914 there were 130 men whose incomes exceeded $250,000 but were under $300,000; now there are 350 men who enjoy that income. In 1914 there were 233 men with incomes between $200,000 and $250,000, and now there are 750 men who enjoy that income. In 1914 there were 406 men whose incomes exceeded $150,000 and were under $200,000; now there are 1,300 men who enjoy that income. I regard these figurse as entirely too conservative and far below the real facts.

Mr. President, we get a little light upon this question from the size of the income taxes and excess-profits taxes that have been paid. When we turn to them we find that the excess-profits and income taxes paid during the war indicate that there must have been a general increase of wealth far beyond the figures given in this report.

The excess-profits tax for 1917 was $1,638,747,740; but the gentlemen or the institutions that paid that excess-profits tax had left in their pockets a very much larger sum than the tax.

The excess-profits taxes in 1918 were $2,505,565,939; but the institutions paying that two and a half billion dollars as public taxes probably had left three times that amount in their own coffers, if the truth were known.

In 1919 the excess-profits taxes, not yet all accounted for, were approximately $1,320,000,000—excess profits, mark you now, made in the year after the war was over—and these profiteers had left in their pockets a sum probably equivalent to two or three times the taxes paid.

In 1920—approximated again, for the Treasury Department has not been able to keep up with the business—the excess-profits taxes paid amounted to $950,000,000, almost a billion dollars. Those who paid such taxes have in their pockets probably two and a half to three billions of dollars left to them out of their excess profits.

In 1921 it is estimated that there will be received $450,000,000 of excess-profits taxes; and that means that the individuals or corporations paying that excess-profits tax will have left in their pockets out of the income for the coming year approximately $2,000,000,000, and this is three years after the war is ended.

The proposition, therefore, of the first part of the amendment I have offered, is that we shall continue the excess-profits tax as it has been heretofore levied. Not a penny of excess-profits tax is laid until the corporation has made 10 per cent net upon its invested capital. Thereupon the excess-profits tax takes one dollar out of five of the profits until the corporation has received a 20 per cent profit on their invested capital.

If it makes above 20 per cent on its invested capital, then it pays a 40 per cent tax upon such part of its excess profits as are above 20 per cent. It therefore has left in every instance more than $60 out of every $100 of its profits, no matter though its profits may go to 1,000 per cent, or even a higher figure.

The bill proposes to continue these taxes as they are paid now. Not a dollar of this tax comes out of the man who earns his living with his hands. Not a dollar of this tax comes out of the pockets of the man who earns his living with his brain. Not a dollar of this tax comes out of any corporation until it has made more than 10 per cent of profit, and paid all of its expenses. Then, and then only, does the tax accrue.

It is proposed by the majority to strike down this tax, to remit this tax to the profiteers, to leave every dollar of their excess profits in their pockets, taking nothing for the Public Treasury, except, of course, the flat corporation tax which is levied upon every corporation, big or little, the poor as well as the prosperous. It is proposed, as I have said, to strike down this tax, to wipe it out, to deprive the Government of that revenue. Such a policy has been the fixed policy of this administration, and has been approved by the votes of the Senate.

That, therefore, is the situation so far as the excess-profits tax is concerned. We are to leave that tax in the pockets of the profiteers, of the gentlemen who have not been satisfied with normal gains, of the individuals who grew rich during this war, who waxed fat behind the battle line, who speculated upon the necessities of the people, and who plundered—for much of it is plunder—the people and the Nation in its hour of trial and distress. While the average man with a small income was buying bonds and borrowing the money or pledging his meager property for their purchase, these institutions were growing fat and rich. While the ordinary citizen, poor or in moderate circumstances, was asked to give and give and give, to furnish the means to build the ships, to pay for the cannon, to furnish the arms; while the wash woman bought her bond out of her earnings in the suds; while the shop girl strove to save for her country; while the widow offered her mite; while little children emptied their china banks to buy war-savings stamps; while all were scrimping, and giving, giving, giving, these gentlemen, to whom I advert, were taking, taking, taking.

Let me not be misunderstood. I make no war on any man because he has money. I make no attack upon a corporation because it has money. I do not belong to those who assail wealth merely because it is wealth; but I do say that in the justice of Heaven the expenses of a war ought to be borne chiefly by those who have become enriched by that war. I do say that in the justice of God and the justice of man, if there is anybody who ought to pay for the expenses of a war, it is those who have profiteered upon the Nation in the hour of its necessity.

The proposition of this amendment is to continue the excess-profits tax, to leave in the pockets of every profiteer an amount equal to more than 80 per cent of his gains provided he has not made over 20 per cent, and to leave in his pockets over 60 per cent of his gains if he has made above 40 per cent, and with the rest of it to pay the soldiers' adjusted compensation.

If our soldiers had not been ready to meet like lions the foe, if they had not made of their bodies a protective wall of flesh and of blood, if they had not gone down to their death with heroic courage, the profiteers in this country to-day would be paying tribute to William II of Germany, and the tax collector would have worn a steel helmet.

Mr. President, why this peculiar attempt to take care of corporate profiteers? If an individual is engaged in trade, whereby he makes great profits, you levy upon his advancing income a surtax. Even the Senate, although against the orders of the administration, broke away from the leading strings and harness which had been put upon them and retained the surtax upon incomes of 50 per cent maximum. But the corporate profiteer is more generously treated. He escapes on everything except the flat tax. There is no advancing tax as to him.

The Senate has adopted the provision which declares that the small estate shall be taxed but a small amount, that the large estate shall pay a gradually increasing tax, until the tax mounts, I believe, to 50 per cent in the case of enormously large estates, so that we have established, as to the individual man living, the principle of an excess-profits tax in the shape of a surtax, while we have established as to the dead a mounting tax, depending upon the size of their estates.

But when we come to corporations which have profiteered, and are yet profiteering, we abandon that principle, and declare that the corporation, if it makes excess profits, can keep them in its coffers. Why such tenderness toward the corporation?

I come now to a point for which I ask consideration by every Senator who gives me the compliment of his attention—and there are not many, not so many as would be here if the soldiers were marching away—I ask, why this distinction in favor of the corporation? We may try to disguise it as we will, the fact is that the great corporations in this country have been exercising a sinister influence, not only on public opinion, but they have been so potential in the councils of the great leaders of political parties that they have dictated their own terms, and their terms were unconditional surrender. There is to-day a peculiar reason which emphasizes the enormity of this policy. It is found in the fact that every farmer in the United States is selling everything he produces at less than prewar prices, and is buying his necessities in a market controlled by profiteers. I say controlled by profiteers, and no reasonable man can deny the statement. Why am I warranted in saying that? Wool is selling for less than it has sold for in the United States in the last 20 years. The price has gone down to almost nothing. Yet every woolen garment costs two or three or four times what it did before the war.

What is the cause of that? Is it on account of an increase in wages? Wages have advanced somewhat, but wages are now declining, and rapidly declining. Making every allowance possible for increased costs, there is such a gap between the price of the raw material and the price of the finished product that it is perfectly manifest that there must be an enormous profit realized. Otherwise, why should the Treasury estimate that, under present depressed conditions, $450,000,000 can be collected this year upon excess profits?

You need not argue this question very long with a farmer who has marketed a steer's hide for a dollar and a quarter and in turn is compelled to pay $12 for a pair of shoes which before the war he could have bought for four or five dollars.

You need not argue this question long with the soldier boy, who in too many instances is tramping this country out of a job, and who, if he finds it necessary to buy clothing for his back, victuals for his stomach, shoes for his feet, or a hat for his head, pays two or three prices, although the raw materials have in every instance gone down to practically prewar prices. With these profiteers, then, still plundering and plucking the people, we are asked to relieve them of their taxes.

Mr. President, that presents one side of the question involved. Let us turn to the other side.

The Republican Party stood pledged, as far as a party could be pledged, to the payment of adjusted compensation to the soldiers. The Democratic Party was similarly committed. To state it fairly, neither party was committed to a particular bill; but they both committed themselves to do justice by the soldiers. There might be a difference of opinion as to what would be justice, but the broad pledge was made, and no one expected it to be construed in a niggardly or miserly way.

Nearly a year and a half ago, just before the election, there was reported in the House of Representatives an adjusted compensation bill. I think it was almost unanimously reported. The soldiers were given to understand that the party then in control proposed to see to it that the bill was speedily passed. The bill was held up, the election was had, and that particular bill disappeared.

Next we witnessed the spectacle of another bill, of which I have now introduced a copy as a part of my amendment, put upon the program and the country advised that it was one of the bills first to be passed in this extra session of Congress, reported out unanimously, brought to the Senate, discussed, and about to pass, when the President and the Secretary of the Treasury intervened by declaring that the country could not pay the adjusted compensation now because of insufficient revenue. Yet at that moment both of these gentlemen knew that the reason why we would not have sufficient revenue was because the tax law was to be changed.

Accordingly the bill was returned months ago to the committee, with an assurance that it would be speedily taken up for sympathetic consideration. It has not had any sympathy that anybody could discover since that moment. It has not had any more sympathy from that committee than a prehistoric animal frozen in an Alaskan glacier 3,000 years ago has received sunshine and warmth from that day to this. There it sleeps the sleep that knows no waking. The flowers of rhetoric that had been woven into beautiful garlands for the soldiers are now faded and forgotten.

But the corporations were very busy getting their excess-profits taxes taken off, and the reason why we could not have revenue to pay the soldiers' bonus was demonstrated at last when the majority reported this bill that proposes to take $90,000,000 of taxes from some 1,200 millionaires, relieving them to that extent of taxes; $75,000,000 from the tax on corporate stock, relieving the corporations to that extent; and $450,000,000 of taxes from the profiteers, a total of $615,000,000, every penny of which was taken from the rich and the prosperous except the corporation-stock tax, and that amounted to nothing on small corporations, but amounted to something like $1,000,000 or $1,500,000 on such corporations as the Steel Trust and the Standard Oil and the great robbers and outlaws in the commercial world. I use the terms robber and outlaw justifiably, and out of the briefs of the Federal Government filed in the cases against them I can quote language as strong as that.

So we then knew why the soldiers' bonus could not be paid. They could not pay the soldiers their debt of heavy gratitude for dauntless valor, but they could pay the corporations and the profiteers for their political service, and they paid them by taking the taxes off of them and taking the compensation away from the soldier. Had they said, "We are opposed in principle to the soldiers' bonus and do not intend to pay it," it would have been quite a different thing. It would have been a manly acceptance of responsibility. But when they offered the excuse that the Government could not pay the soldiers' bonus and then took from the taxes of the profiteers a sum that would more than pay the soldiers bonus, I say it is as arrant a piece of hypocrisy as ever disgraced those charged with high responsibility.

What are the taxes we obtain if we continue this law in effect? Four hundred and fifty million dollars next year from excess-profits tax. What does the soldiers' bonus cost? Now, I am going to quote the figures that were prepared, not by a wicked Democrat, not by a demagogue, a word that is so often hissed across the aisle. The word "demagogue" is the last line of defense of a man who is without argument and who takes refuge in abuse.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield just for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. STANLEY. If those who are now defending the bonus are demagogues, the term would apply with the same force to the Finance Committee who unanimously reported this. It would look like we are all demagogues except Mr. Mellon, the President, and the chiefs of high finance. We have all voted that way.

Mr. REED. My friend, who is about as smart a man as I know of, misses the point. He has been reared down there on the dark and bloody ground of Kentucky, where they still think along human lines. To advocate the soldiers' bonus does not make a man a demagogue. It is a proposal of a tax upon a profiteer that makes one a demagogue.

Mr. STANLEY. "'I see,' said the blind man!" [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. According to the figures prepared and brought here by the Finance Committee, the same committee that now strikes down the tax upon profiteers, they estimate that if all soldiers demand their pay in cash it would cost, during the year 1923, the sum of $473,143,200, but as by the terms of the bill the soldiers' bonus does not begin until July, there would be accumulated a surplus of approximately $250,000,000. The tax upon excess profits amounting to $450,000,000, not only is that year taken care of, but a surplus sufficient would exist to carry it over the next year with the tax of that year provided the profits continue as they are now, so that we could meet $600,000,000 for 1924 and then the tax in 1925 would drop to $38,552,693.

Thus it is clear beyond peradventure, assuming that the profits tax should be equal in the coming two years to that which will be received this year, that we can take care of the entire soldiers' bonus if every soldier demands the cash instead of taking the deferred-payment plan.

But it is also estimated by the same committee, headed by the distinguished Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and by his experts, that in all probability not more than one-third of the soldiers would demand cash, and in that event we would have money, and money to burn, out of the excess-profits tax.

So, Mr. President, the cold truth of the matter is that in order to take these taxes off of great wealth and off of profiteers, the soldiers were denied the right of consideration by the Congress of the United States.

Now, an unpleasant situation has been created. The facts to which I have just adverted have been laid bare before the country. The fact that the dominant party, having to choose between the soldiers whom it respects and loves, and the clamors of the profiteer, took the profiteers' side. That ugly situation has been developed. When the amendment was offered which proposed to pay the soldiers the bonus—adjusted compensation is the better term—out of the profits of the profiteer, it became so embarrassing that the political sharks determined that something must be done. Some excuse must be offered. So the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives gave out his remarkable interview in which he denounced at least myself, if no others, as a demagogue for talking about taxing profiteers. Let me say in passing that if I owned about half the timber in the northwestern portion of the United States and had seen it advance in the last few years from a few dollars per acre stumpage to fabulous prices, I might get so far into that timber and into its shadows that I could not see anything but the timber, and I might conclude that everybody was a demagogue who said anything about levying a tax on the profits that I had made. I might even give a good deal of attention to a tariff on timber as well as taking the tax off profits; but, of course, a gentleman situated in that way is not a demagogue. Nobody is ever a demagogue who has made a great deal of money, particularly if he made it without doing much hard work.

Now, however, this distinguished statesman comes forward with two propositions; and when I shall have disposed of them, I shall be content to give the floor to others. The first is that this amendment, offered at this time and in this way, is unconstitutional; that a revenue bill, being before the Senate of the United States and amendable, so that we can increase taxes or lower taxes as we see fit, can not be amended so that a portion of the funds to be raised by the taxes which we have the right to levy shall be devoted to such a cause as the payment of an obligation to the soldiers of the United States. Mr. President, I decline to discuss that question, because it is not a debatable one.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, did Mr. FORDNEY say that he thought the proposal was unconstitutional or that he hoped it was unconstitutional?

Mr. REED. He did not use the exact term, but he said that we had no power to take such action, and that we were delaying the soldiers' bonus. What was breaking his heart was that we were postponing the soldiers' bonus. How does it postpone the soldiers' bonus? Suppose we adopt this amendment and Mr. FORDNEY should ask his associates in the House of Representatives to adopt it there, the soldier would commence to collect his bonus just as soon as the tax had been gathered and accounted for along about next July.

Mr. FORDNEY's other statement was that they proposed to do what? To levy a sales tax some time next summer, just when the campaign is getting under way again, and to provide that the sales tax should be devoted to the payment of the soldiers' bonus; in other words, to do exactly the thing that I am seeking here to provide—that a certain fund shall be devoted to a certain end. The difference between the distinguished champion of this idea and myself is that I propose to take the tax out of the pockets of the profiteer and he proposes to take it out of the pockets of the masses of the people through a sales tax. If that is the purpose, then, in the name of common sense, why did he not think of the sales tax when this bill was before him only 40 or 50 days ago? If his heart was then bleeding for the soldier and his sympathies were then aroused, why did he not propose the sales tax then, have the soldiers' bonus attached to it then, and put it through the House of Representatives? Then it would have been here ready for us to act on now.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. STANLEY. The House of Representatives has stated that it is against a sales tax now and probably would be against a sales tax a year from now.

Mr. REED. Yes; but we are asked not to adopt this amendment, which will provide the money and give the bonus, and will do it now, but to accept a promise of something which Mr. FORDNEY might have delivered, if he could deliver it at all, 60 days ago, and which everybody who is informed about the question believes can never be delivered. If it ever is delivered I will tell Senators why it will be delivered. If the soldier gets a bonus next year, he will get it because the great taxpayers of this country under present legislation want to shift the burden of their taxes from themselves to the great mass of the people so badly that they would be willing, if they could get the principle of the sales tax inaugurated, to let the soldiers have part of it. I think that the chief argument that will be made will be this: "We can take the soldiers' bonus bill and put it in one end of the basket, and everybody who wants a soldiers' bonus will have to vote for the bill, although we put in the other end of the basket a tax upon the necessities of life that everybody must pay. In other words, he is doing exactly what I am doing; he is attaching the soldiers' bonus bill to a measure which is unpopular and oppressive—I say he is doing what I am doing, he is attaching two bills, as I am doing; but I am attaching the soldiers' bonus bill to a tax that is to be paid exclusively by the profiteers, while he proposes to attach it to a tax which is to be paid by everybody, including the soldiers.

Now, I am going to say to the Senators here that it may be possible that the gentlemen who are controlling the public legislation to-day are so eager to have the principle of the sales tax established that they even would be willing to attach a soldiers' bonus bill to it in order to get it established, for the soldiers' bonus will soon be paid off, but the tax, once being established, they will try to keep it in the law perpetually. So Senators who vote here to-day must vote with their eyes open. If they vote against this amendment which I propose, they are either against the soldiers' bonus or they prefer a sales tax and a soldiers' bonus to a tax on profiteers and a soldiers' bonus.

That is this case; that is this situation. There is no escaping it; there is no use in trying to dodge it. My opinion is that they are working steadily along with the idea of fastening the sales tax upon the country. But let us assume that the sales tax is adopted hereafter and the soldiers' bonus attached to it, and let us contrast that with the plan I suggest. The plan I suggest will pay the soldiers the bonus, and not a dollar of it will have to be paid by the soldiers of the country and not a dollar of it will have to be paid by those institutions that are content with normal profits; but if the sales tax is adopted every soldier will have to pay the tax out of which his bonus is paid.

There were 4,500,000 soldiers; they represent approximately 22,000,000 people, for soldiers have families and kith and kin. One-fifth of the tax would be gathered from the soldiers themselves or their immediate blood kin; for what is a sales tax? A sales tax is a tax levied upon the sale of goods, and as everybody has to buy practically everything he consumes it means that every man will pay a tribute upon the thing he buys, and, without any question, the purchaser pays that tax, for it is levied upon him in the very act of purchase. It is exactly like going to a moving-picture show. So much is paid for a ticket, and the tax is paid through the window. So a sales tax is a tax that every individual in the United States who eats or wears anything or sleeps in any habitation must help to pay. Although its proponents may say, "We levy it only on particular articles," they will fool no wise person by that, for the economic and industrial systems are so interwoven that a sales tax can not be levied on any of the important essentials of life without that tax being carried into substantially everything that is purchased. So that Senators will have their choice here—at best a soldiers' bonus to be passed at some indefinite time in the future and paid for out of a sales tax, with the chances largely that the bonus never will be passed but the sales tax will be, or a proposition to give the soldiers a bonus now and pay it out of the taxes of those who have grown fat and who are to-day fattening upon excess profits.

Mr. President, during the war we seriously talked of passing laws making it a criminal offense to raise the prices of commodities unreasonably. We are to-day exempting from taxation the very men who did it. The Senate passed a law to regulate rents in the District of Columbia, probably violating the Constitution of the United States when they did so, and you have rent commissions to-day to reduce by force the rent charges, because you say the landlord is a profiteer and is charging too much; yet here is a bill that proposes to exempt a corporation indulging in that very practice from a simple tax upon its profits.

Mr. President, on day before yesterday there met at my home city the greatest concourse of soldiers from civil life who ever gathered anywhere on the face of the earth. It took that vast body of men something like four hours to march in review. They had a convention. They had something to say about this proposition. Their president, Mr. Emery, declared:

> Such means as were used last summer to beat adjusted compensation can not ultimately succeed. Nothing is settled until it is settled right, and the national adjusted compensation issue has not been settled at all. The American people are the court of last resort, and wherever the American people have by the ballot passed judgment on the matter, that judgment has been an indorsement of the legion's stand.
> I can not conceive of a Congress so derelict in its duty, so unmindful of its just obligation to those who served their country at great financial loss, or so blind to the wishes of our people, as to be misled again into refusing to adjust the economic balance between the man who went to war and the man who did not.
>
> When the Senate last summer, at President Harding's personal request, killed the McCumber bonus bill, it bowed to the will of the Executive and not to fact or reason. The cost of adjusted compensation was grossly exaggerated by Secretary Mellon.

I desire to insert without reading the rest of the remarks of Mr. Emery.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> "The greatest legion achievement of the year has been won for our disabled comrades," Emery declared. "From press and platform the people were deluged with a mass of incontrovertible evidence of the shocking conditions confronting our helpless and disabled veterans. The effect was almost instantaneous. In two months the case of the disabled had become a national issue."
>
> Emery indicated that the legion will actively press its efforts on behalf of unemployed veterans.
> "As a class, ex-service men are suffering more keenly than any other in the present period of industrial depression and subnormal employment," he said. "It is a duty of the legion to extend every aid to these comrades, and a duty which I know the legion will not fail to perform."

Mr. REED. That was the utterance of the president of this organization. I desire to present in that connection the formal resolution adopted, I think, without a dissenting vote at the convention:

> Whereas there is pending in Congress House bill 1 and Senate bill 506, a measure to provide adjusted compensation to the soldiers, sailors, and marines of the great war; and
> Whereas this adjusted compensation measure provides for the payment of the Nation's just obligations to the service men and women for the financial and economical handicap suffered by them incident to their service; and
>
> Whereas the Nation should and is paying all of its other war debts and obligations; and
>
> Whereas the obligations of the Nation to its soldiers arises by reason of economic handicap suffered by them because of their service, which economic handicap is at this time felt with especial severity because of widespread general unemployment; and
>
> Whereas after careful consideration of all the arguments advanced in opposition to the measure, including the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury and the address of the President to Congress, we still firmly believe in the justice, fairness, and immediate necessity of the adjusted compensation measure: Now, therefore, be it
> Resolved, That the American Legion in national convention assembled reaffirm its stand upon adjusted compensation, and asks that the Congress of the United States pass this measure without further equivocation or delay.

Mr. President, I do not know whether the demand of these gallant men will receive any attention or not, but it seems to me that it ought to receive some consideration. Reviewing that mighty marching army of veterans were the two military chieftains who had so much to do with the great contest. I want to read just a few words, just a paragraph from the speech of Gen. Foch, who journeyed all the way from France to attend this meeting; and then I ask to have put in the RECORD, because of its historic value and at the end of my remarks, the speech of Gen. Foch.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is so ordered, without objection.

Mr. REED. Speaking to these American soldiers whom he had commanded, this eagle of the French Army exclaimed:

> My dear comrades of the American Legion:
>
> I can not tell you how great is my satisfaction at finding myself amongst you, valiant soldiers of 1918, to live again our glorious memories. Three years ago, on the 1st of November, 1918, the entire American Army in France took up vigorously the pursuit of the defeated enemy and did not halt until the German surrender.
> Hour of glory for the American Army, a proper culmination for a military effort, prodigious alike in its intensity as in its rapidity. One and all, you have had your share in it. You may well be proud.

He recites the unbroken successes of American Armies, and concludes:

> Glory to the First American Army; glory also to those of your divisions which, distributed among the French and British Armies, contributed in great measure to the final success, whether with the Fifth French Army to the northwest of Rheims or with the Fourth French Army, in which they carried in magnificent assault the strong positions of Orfeuilles; or, again, with the British Armies for the capture of the famous Hindenburg line, or with the group of armies of Flanders, pursuing the enemy upon the road to Brussels.

During this time your Second Army impatiently awaited to attack in its turn in the direction of Metz, which already was stretching her arms to us for deliverance; but, harassed and defeated, the enemy laid down his arms.

A solemn hour which compensated all the sacrifices freely consented for the cause of right.

It is you who have made these sacrifices. More than 75,000 of your countrymen were buried in the soil of France. May they rest in peace. Your French brothers in arms watch over them.

Glory to you who survive them and who enjoy victorious peace. You may well be proud of your past exploits.

Your country had asked of you to lay low a redoubtable enemy. You have placed him at your mercy, and after having assured every guaranty for the liberty of our peoples you have imposed upon him the peace which our Government have dictated. Has not your task been completely fulfilled?

As for me, the great honor of my life will be to have guided along the road of victory the American Army of 1918, which was a real grand Army, beginning with its commander.

Mr. President, that is the appeal for the American soldier, made by the lips of probably the greatest living soldier. That is the estimate in which he held these men. The foreign commander of a foreign host recognizes their claim upon the country and upon the world; but the Congress denies them an adjusted compensation to make up a little for their financial loss, because to do it they must take some tribute from those who grew rich through the war, from those who are growing rich in selling goods to the discharged soldiers to-day.

Ah, my Republican brothers, when the battle flags were unfurled in our country there were no politics then. We forgot political lines. I said then, and I say now, and I say it with infinite pleasure, there was no hanging back on the part of the Republicans in the Senate and in the House and in the country. The son of the Republican and the son of the Democrat said good-by alike to kindred at home. Together they marched away. Together they suffered. Together some of them died.

Let us do justice by these men with the same unanimity with which we asked them to respond to the laws we passed. We conscripted the bone and the flesh, the living, quivering thing we call a man. Can we not conscript or take by just and righteous laws some of the profits made out of the war to do justice by American soldiers?

You may have drawn your party lines taut now; you may have made your promises, but there is no promise so sacred and no party ties so holy that it ought for a moment to prevent you from doing justice to the saviors of your country.

APPENDIX.

FOCH GIVES PRAISE TO AMERICAN ARMY—TELLS LEGION OF HOUR OF GLORY THREE YEARS AGO WHEN GERMANS RETREATED—RELATES VICTORIOUS DEEDS—SPLENDID SPIRIT OF NATION SHOWN ON FIELD OF BATTLE AND IN TRANSPORTING TROOPS.

(By the Associated Press.)

KANSAS CITY, MO., November 1.

Following is the text of Marshal Foch's address before the American Legion convention:

"Officers, noncommissioned officers, and soldiers of the great American Army:

"My dear comrades of the American Legion:

"I can not tell you how great is my satisfaction at finding myself amongst you, valiant soldiers of 1918, to live again our glorious memories. Three years ago, on the 1st of November, 1918, the entire American Army in France took up vigorously the pursuit of the defeated enemy and did not halt until the German surrender.

"Hour of glory for the American Army, a proper culmination for a military effort, prodigious alike in its intensity as in its rapidity. One and all you have had your share in it. You may well be proud.

"In responding in mass to the call to arms of your Government; in equipping, training, and organizing yourselves as rapidly as possible, you had in view only the purpose to take your place as soon as possible in the line of battle.

WHAT AMERICA DID.

"In numbers: Eighteen months after the declaration of war by the United States on Germany the American Army had passed from effectives of 9,500 officers and 125,000 men to 180,000 officers and 3,500,000 men.

"Effort of organization: If in the month of March, 1918, you had in France but 6 divisions, six months later you had 41, of which 31 engaged in battle.

"Effort in instruction: In order to have officers, noncommissioned officers, and men rapidly trained, you multiplied in America, as in France, your schools and camps, which became centers of prodigious activity.

"In order to arm you and camp you the American manufactories worked without respite and supplied all your needs.

"Admirable effort also in transportation. You swept away every obstacle which interfered with bringing your units from the centers of instruction to the ports of embarkation.

EFFORTS OF ORGANIZATION.

"In France you improved the ports of debarkation, created new installations, increased the traffic of the railroad system by work of all kinds, and multiplied your storehouses and hospitals.

"Your shipyards were organized for intensive production in such a way that when the war ended you utilized for your ocean transportation almost 4,000,000 of marine tonnage instead of 94,000, available at the beginning of the war.

"And meanwhile your splendid war fleet, thanks to its vigilance and its fine military qualities, protected, with an efficiency to which I am happy to pay tribute here, the transportation of your troops and material.

"A prodigious effort on the part of your entire Nation's intelligence, will power, and energy. A prodigious effort which has filled your associates with admiration and gratitude and confounded your enemy.

"This splendid spirit of an entire Nation we find again on the battle fields of France, where it was blazoned in the admirable virtues of bravery and heroism.

LAURELS WON BY AMERICANS.

"It was the spirit of the Second and Third American Army Divisions which, one month later, took part in the battle of the Marne and distinguished themselves immediately in operations around Chateau-Thierry and in Belleau Wood. Again it was the spirit of those five divisions which, on the 18th of July participated in the victorious counter offensive of the tenth and sixth French armies between the Aisne and the Marne and contributed in great measure to that victory.

"Finally it was the spirit which animated all the American Army when, on the 24th of July, Gen. Pershing formed your splendid units under his own direct command.

"On the 12th of September, 1918, the First American Army delivered its first battle on the soil of France. It dislodged the enemy from the St. Mihiel salient, where he had intrenched himself for nearly four years, threw him back beyond the foot of the hills of the Meuse. From the very first the American Army entered into glory. How many further laurels was it yet to win?

FIGHTING IN THE ARGONNE.

"The St. Mihiel operation was nearly ended when the American Army attacked on a new front. On September 25 it was engaged on the right wing of the vast allied offensive. The point of direction assigned to it was Mezieres, on the Meuse.

"Deployed from the left bank of the Meuse to the eastern confines of Champagne, it had three army corps in line on a front of nearly 40 kilometers.

"Before it stretched the region of the Argonne, formidable emplacement of the German defense, a wooded terrain, rugged, difficult in its very nature, and rendered more so by all the defensive organizations which had been accumulated there during the last four years.

"Nothing could discourage or check your army. It threw itself with generous ardor into the immense melee. The task was a rude one, but it was carried out to a thorough finish.

"Fighting without respite night and day for a month, advancing in spite of the pitfalls and the counter attacks of the enemy, it succeeded by pure force of tenacity and heroism in liberating the wild region of the Argonne.

PENETRATED GERMAN LINES.

"After St. Mihiel it could now inscribe proudly upon its banners the name of the Argonne.

"On the 16th of October, this great task finished, it joined hands with the Fourth French Army in the defile of Grand Pre.

"In consequence of this the enemy's resistance was severely shaken; the moment had arrived to give him the final blow.

"On the 1st day of November, just three years ago to-day, the First American Army again attacked, and in a splendid advance reached Buzancy, penetrating the German lines for more than 10 kilometers.

"The enemy this time retired definitely; the Stars and Stripes at once took up the pursuit and, six days later, floated victoriously over the Meuse reconquered.

"After St. Mihiel, after the Argonne, the American banners now bore the name of 'Meuse!' In a few months you had taken 45,000 prisoners and 1,400 cannon from the enemy.

"Glory to the First American Army; glory also to those of your divisions which, distributed among the French and British Armies, contributed in great measure to the final success, whether with the Fifth French Army to the northwest of Rheims or with the Fourth French Army, in which they carried in magnificent assault the strong positions of Orfeuilles; or again with the British armies for the capture of the famous Hindenburg line, or with the group of armies of Flanders, pursuing the enemy upon the road to Brussels.

"During this time your Second Army impatiently awaited to attack in its turn in the direction of Metz, which already was stretching her arms to us for deliverance; but, harassed and defeated, the enemy laid down his arms!

"A solemn hour which compensated all the sacrifices freely consented to for the cause of right.

"It is you who have made these sacrifices. More than 75,000 of your countrymen were buried in the soil of France. May they rest in peace. Your French brothers in arms watch over them.

"Glory to you who survive them and who enjoy victorious peace. You may well be proud of your past exploits.

"Your country had asked of you to lay low a redoubtable enemy. You have placed him at your mercy, and after having assured every guaranty for the liberty of our peoples, you have imposed upon him the peace which our Government have dictated. Has not your task been completely fulfilled?

"As for me, the great honor of my life will be to have guided along the road of victory the American Army of 1918, which was a real grand army, beginning with its commander."

ADDRESS BY THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. President, at the recent convention of the American Legion at Kansas City the Vice President of the United States, Hon. CALVIN COOLIDGE, delivered a very learned and instructive address, and since it bears upon the general subject of the relations and obligations between the veterans of the World War and their Government, I ask unanimous consent to have the address printed in the RECORD, and in the ordinary RECORD type.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF THE VICE PRESIDENT AT KANSAS CITY.

The Legion holds by righteous conquest the title of American. There was never reposed in any other military force the proud distinction of so completely representing the whole Nation. It is notorious that the people of the Colonies were divided. Many of their number, of most respectable attainments and most unquestioned character, doubted the wisdom of the patriot cause.

When the Revolution became victorious they left by scores of thousands or remained silent but unconvinced. In the War of 1812, with its strange commingling of the most ignominious defeats with the most brilliant victories both by land and sea, there was grave lack of popular approval, which in some sections bordered on open resistance. The War with Mexico was widely criticized. Abraham Lincoln, while withholding no note of support for the army in the field, violently denounced the motives which brought on the conflict. The War between the States needs but to be named to show the complete division of two sections of our people which even the War with Spain did not completely reunite. The opportunity to make this Nation one, the sacrifice which made this Nation one, was of your day alone. All the streams of that great spirit are gathered up in you. You represent a new national consciousness. You represent the consummation of those great forces, coming into action in the early days of this century, which not only made America more American but made humanity more humane. The hope of this Nation, which more than ever before corresponds with the hope of the world, lies in your power to minister to that spirit, to preserve that consciousness, and to increase those forces.

You saw the mighty urge of all these causes which began on July 28, 1914, and culminated on November 11, 1918. When the Great War broke on an unsuspecting world few people in Europe and fewer still on this side of the Atlantic understood it. Stunned by its reported atrocities, we were principally interested in keeping out of what we believed was no concern of ours. There were those who recognized that it was an attack on all that was represented by our civilization, who declared from the outset that it was an American war, and urged an immediate preparation for a victorious defense. Denounced in official quarters, looked on as jeopardizers of peace, they went for the most part unheeded. But there came a day when the violation of our rights, the loss of our property, the destruction of the lives of our citizens, and the assertion that these were to continue, left no choice but to declare that all this constituted the making of war upon our country and that force must be resisted with force.

To meet the requirements of that situation, it is scarcely too much to say that the American people presented themselves at the altar of their country with the offering of their every dollar and their every life. The flame of patriotism swept over the whole land, consuming away the dross of all past differences and fusing the entire people into one common national unity. The Army and Navy, forever unmatched among men, born of this new spirit, the money with which it filled the Treasury, the gigantic charities which it supported, the stupendous and unending flood of all kinds of supplies that it created, the victory that it made possible—these are now known to all the world. All this gave a new meaning to the life of our country, a new meaning which found its finest expression in a new nationalism, deeper and more fervid than ever before, summed up in one word, "American." As the months have passed, as public opinion has found expression, it is more and more evident that the people fought in self-defense; they fought to preserve America, and in that sacrifice found a new life.

The tremendous contribution which our military forces made to this new national spirit can never be overestimated. There were those who saw our country enter the war with great regret. They were willing to sacrifice the undoubted rights of our citizens to the maintenance of peace. There were those who opposed sending an army overseas. They were critical of the purpose of the Government. But when once our Navy reached the scene of conflict, when once our soldiers and marines were in France, all regret and all criticism ceased in the most loyal support ever given by a people to their forces in the field. Devotion to you and your comrades removed all discord, and out of the intensity of that same devotion was created a new conception of the responsibility and dignity of citizenship and a new national spirit. When the results of winning the war are considered this stands out most prominently, and for it, as for victory, the chief credit must go to those who bore arms.

This may not be the ultimate result, but it is the result up to this time, and if it becomes fixed in the life of the Nation it is worth all it cost. There may be other steps to take, but this one had to be taken first, for without that unity of purpose that comes from an intense national spirit there can be no permanent progress, no promotion of our domestic welfare, no service to the world.

It is because the American Legion stands in a position, by its broad and representative membership, by its common experience and common sacrifice, which no other organization can occupy, that it holds the greatest hope for the maintenance of a true national spirit.

When we consider the service which you and your comrades performed, the stupendous scale of the operations, the wide-reaching results, the courage and devotion constantly displayed, that you saved America and doing it saved the world, we realize something of the gratitude that is your due, something of the glory that you have won. Your countrymen will ever hold these among their choicest treasures.

There are some things that can wait. Others perish in the waiting. The most commanding duty that resulted from the war was the proper relief of all incapacitated veterans. This the last administration attempted to do. The task was large and new. It required law and organization. A generous beginning was made, but the work lagged. There is nothing closer to the heart of President Harding than making this relief absolutely complete. No man not in the service has a deeper appreciation of what that service meant, of the sacrifices made by the veterans, of the obligations incurred by the country, and no man will go further to minister to the true welfare of those who have been in the service and their dependents than the President of the United States. He will never sacrifice you for his own welfare. He will sacrifice himself for your welfare. He will do all that can be done to prevent the need of your again sacrificing yourselves for your country's welfare.

I know that you are well aware that your glory lies in what you have given and may give to your country, not in what your country has or may give to you. But a country which is worth defending takes care of its defenders. You have a right to a report of what your country is doing for your comrades. All relief has been reorganized and consolidated in one department under a new law passed on the recommendation of the Legion. At its head is Lieut. Col. Forbes, who rose from the ranks overseas. The Veterans' Bureau and the agencies now included in it up to October 1 have paid $71,000,000 for medical and hospital services, $267,000,000 for compensation, $254,000,000 for insurance awards, $582,000,000 for allotments and allowances, $171,000,000 for vocational education. The amount disbursed by this bureau in September was $34,237,000. This reaches a total of $1,345,000,000, about one-third of all pensions paid by the Government from its beginning up to our entry into the World War.

The yearly expenditures of the Veterans' Bureau are running at the rate of about $411,000,000, which is more than one-half the entire expense of the Government before the war.

Every effort is being made to avoid delay in passing on claims. There have been established 14 district offices and 140 suboffices for the presentation and determination of compensation and insurance awards. Late in April there were 200,000 claims pending before the War Risk Insurance Bureau. About 150,000 of these have been adjudicated. Except in cases of dispute each application secures immediate determination. Out of about 975,000 requested medical examinations there are less than 30,000 claims now awaiting review by the medical department. This includes claims which are upon appeal and which were reopened by the generous provisions of the new law. Seven thousand new hospital beds have been supplied, bringing the total up to 26,750. There is money available and construction is under way which will provide 6,000 additional beds, all under Government operation. There are at the present time about 6,000 vacant beds in Government-controlled institutions. One of the most promising efforts of rehabilitation has been the establishment of a university at Camp Sherman, Ohio, which will provide an academic, commercial, industrial, and agricultural course. Some idea of the tremendous activities of the Veterans' Bureau can be gained when it is remembered that there are now—

Twenty-nine thousand men in hospitals.

Two hundred and seven thousand monthly awards of compensation are being paid.

One hundred and forty thousand monthly awards of insurance are being paid.

Six hundred and thirty-six thousand men are carrying insurance.

Four billion dollars of insurance is in force.

One thousand two hundred insurance claims are received per month.

Seventeen thousand compensation claims are received per month.

Ninety-three thousand men are receiving vocational training.

It is the most cherished ambition of President Harding that there may be no veteran or dependent anywhere within our country entitled by law to relief who shall not be able, promptly and adequately, to secure it. This is done not with any purpose of undertaking to pay for that which is priceless but of undertaking to discharge the most solemn obligation which comes to any Government.

You represent every part of this Nation, every activity of its citizens. It was under your inspiring example that the two greatest obstacles to our full national life were destroyed—sectionalism and class consciousness. The war was won because each section of our Nation and each class of our citizens contributed its full strength to a common cause. The nearly five millions distributed over the entire country, representing in so great a degree the entire people and their entire interests, can not be divorced from the public welfare. Whatever works injury to any of the great activities of the land works injury to them; whatever contributes to the general prosperity contributes to their prosperity. They are at once the man power and the material power of the Nation. They not only take the field but supply the Public Treasury.

The prosperity and welfare, yes, more than that, the righteousness of our country, lies in the service which one section can render to another. The East found success in building railroads, opening mines, and developing the resources of the West; the West found success in feeding the people and supplying the raw products for the factories of the East; the North finds success in the sale of its manufactures in the South; the South finds success in supplying the North with the production of her plantations. This is not competition, but cooperation. Fundamentally this process is right. It is the law of service. Practically it should continue, because it is the only means to success and prosperity. There is no path to permanent prosperity and success which narrowly excludes any section.

It is always easier to think of the part than of the whole. It is easier for men to remember that they work at the plow, the forge, the drill, the spindle, the bench, the desk, or that they follow transportation, the law, medicine, banking, or the ministry, than it is to remember that into the life of every man there goes a part of all these activities and many more, and that, whatever his occupation, each is a part of the whole, and that their permanent prosperity will stand or fall with the permanent prosperity of the whole. No man is wise enough, no combination is strong enough, to transgress this law and long escape its penalties. All artificial privilege always has and always will destroy itself. The law of service is a law of action. No artifice can long circumvent it; no fraud can long cheat it. The United States Constitution is right. Titles to nobility can not be granted or seized. They can only be achieved. They come through service, as yours came, or they do not come at all. If men in civil life in these days of peace would put their thought and effort into the success of the people of the whole country, as in military life you put your thought and effort in time of war into the success of the whole army, the victories of peace would follow as surely as did the victories of war. Government and industry, locality and society, all need the national outlook you so proudly achieved. It is time in every activity in our land for men in every relationship to stop trying to get the better of each other and begin trying to serve each other.

Under these circumstances, considering the great sacrifice you represent and the great stake you have in the country, it is small wonder that you not only exemplify patriotism in your own actions but insist, as you have a right to insist, on patriotic action in others. You have great patience with ignorance and weakness, but no patience at all with any informed and powerful attempt to make a mockery of our institutions, defy the execution of our laws, and violate the rights of our citizens. But in resisting all attacks upon our liberty you will always remember that the sole guaranty of liberty is obedience to law under the forms of ordered government.

The observance of the law is the function of every private citizen, but the execution of the law is the function only of duly constituted public authorities. The last act has been closed in that war which, with the help of your efforts, was brought to a complete victory. A treaty of peace between the United States and the German Empire made for the purpose "of restoring the friendly relations" formerly existing between the two nations, negotiated late in August, ratified by both countries, now awaits only the proclamation of the President of the United States. This treaty expressly reserves to the United States both the rights acquired under the armistice signed on that historic date of November 11, 1918, and those rights provided by the treaty of Versailles. Generally speaking it grants to the United States all of the privileges which it would have gained had it ratified the former treaty and imposes none of the obligations, exclusive of all consideration of the rights and duties proposed by the covenant of the League of Nations. This has brought to a formal close the greatest of all human conflicts. Having accepted it, it becomes our duty to observe not only its letter but its spirit. The position which our country holds in its relationship abroad is shown by the experience of our army on the Rhine. There is every indication that it desires to remain there, it is reported that England and France wish for its continuance, and that most of all Germany is earnestly solicitous that it shall not be withdrawn. The occupation of this army appears to be complete.

But though the war be over, its results, for good and for ill, remain. Its exactions have not yet all been met, nor have its benefits yet all been realized.

There has been appropriated for the support of the National Government for the current political year approximately four billions of dollars. Of this amount one and a third billion is on account of the war debt, more than a quarter of a billion goes to pay pensions of previous wars, three quarters of a billion is required to maintain our present Military Establishment for our protection on land and on sea. The relief work administered by the Veterans' Bureau reaches nearly one-half billion more. This means that the current cost of previous and prospective wars is two and five-sixths billions, while the cost of the Naton's peace activities is one and one-sixth billion. There are considerable expected savings on these amounts, but the proportion will not be greatly changed. This is a burden nearly six times as great as that which it was necessary for the Nation to bear previously to the war. It exacts a tribute directly or indirectly of about $40 from every inhabitant of our country or about $200 from the average family. This enormous expenditure the public can not evade and can not shift. It must be met. No one who has observed the diminishing returns from taxation, the acute depression which overtook all business and which has become prominently acute in agriculture, can fail to realize that every possible relief must be sought and applied.

All this is a mighty obligation even for a great people of great wealth. There is no present service that can be performed for those who have so unselfishly and so gloriously sacrificed themselves in the service, or for their dependents, or for the country at large, which in a peculiar and a sacred sense is their country, so important, so considerate of their welfare, so calculated to discharge a part of the great debt which is their due, as to reduce these obligations, reduce the great drain upon the resources of the people, which will restore the Nation to a state of prosperity, not for an hour or a day, but a lasting and a permanent prosperity for all. This means that economy that comes from a consciousness of peace.

Our own national existence presupposes the national existence of others. Were there no other countries there would be no choice between countries, and therefore no loyalty to one to the exclusion of others, no patriotism. That virtue we claim for ourselves we must recognize in others. If it be well for America to have a strong national spirit it must be well for others to cherish the same sentiment. The war did not break this spirit in any free country; it strengthened it, strengthened it for the glory of all. America first is not selfishness; it is the righteous demand for strength to serve. And America has been dedicated to an unselfish service. I weigh my words when I say that both in Europe and in the Orient that service for humanity has not been exceeded by any other nation. It will not be, then, in diminishing but in enlarging the national spirit that true progress for the race will be found. There can be no society without a home, no civilization without citizenship.

But as a true national spirit calls for a harmonious adjustment of the relationship between all the sections and all the people in the Nation, so it calls for a harmonious relationship between the different nations. This is the spiritual lesson of the war.

The work of Washington was not finished at Yorktown, the work of Lincoln was not completed at Appomattox; they live in our institutions, one in the Constitution which his efforts caused to be adopted, the other in the amendments which his sacrifice caused to be ratified. Your work was not all done on the sea or on the fields of France.

In recognition of the solemn obligation to you and to your countrymen of economy and peace a conference of certain great powers, called on the initiative of the President of the United States, is about to assemble at Washington. It proposes to search for a solution of problems arising from the convergence of many different nations in the Pacific and to provide by mutual agreement for a limitation of armaments. I do not understand that this means that any nation is to divest itself of the power to resist domestic violence or suffer any diminution of independence, but out of mutual understandings the great burden, and it may be the menace, of competitive armaments may be removed. This is a new expression of a great hope; all the greater because it seeks the practical. It proposes something that America can do at home. It surrenders no right, it imposes no burden, it promises relief at home and a better understanding abroad. If it be accomplished its blessings will be reflected at every fireside in the land. The economic pressure of government will be lifted, the hope of a righteous and abiding peace will be exalted.

The hour is still with the veterans of the war. The power, but also the responsibility, not only of citizenship, but of inspiring leadership, is theirs. Their work goes on. In its process there is no room for discouragement. Steadily, silently, but irresistibly, the great principles for which their imperishable sacrifices were made are prevailing over the face of the earth. They have not only overcome the sword of resistance, they have convinced the mind. If anywhere opposing views are held, it is in sullen silence; they dare not be openly declared by any government. They have at once proclaimed a new America, and thereby a new world, to be made secure in mutual understanding and in righteous conduct.

TAX REVISION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8245) to reduce and equalize taxation, to amend and simplify the revenue act of 1918, and for other purposes.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, in the Washington Times of this afternoon appears a statement of Secretary Weeks, a man belonging to a coordinate branch of the Government which I serve, as he does, to which I want to call the attention of the Senate.

On the floor of the Senate the other day, in supporting the soldiers' bonus bill, which I have done whenever it was presented, I took occasion to mention some of the extraordinary sacrifices which those soldiers made as compared with those made by the soldiers of every war heretofore. I will not repeat what I then said as to the extraordinary circumstances under which our American soldiers served abroad. My remarks are in the RECORD. They will stay there.

I quite agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] that every one of the charges I made should be investigated, and if proven to be true punishment should come upon the officers who were responsible for those cruelties inflicted upon our men.

In the course of those remarks I said that the officers, not all of them, but in too many cases, made courtesans of the nurses—not all of them—and that those nurses were thereby made to neglect the wounded, the sick, the suffering, the dying, who were in the hospitals, and who had a right to their services.

Commenting upon that and upon myself, Secretary Weeks has used this language:

> No decent man would make such charges against a class of people, and I measure my words when I say that.

Mr. President, I am going to measure my words as I reply to the Secretary of War. I say that no Secretary of War, publicly referring to a speech made in the Senate on a public question, should use language like that without having first investigated the charges which he condemned. He should have asked me what my information was, and he could have gotten it. He owed it to a member of a coordinate branch of the Government to show him sufficient respect to do that, or something equivalent to that, before he went into the newspapers and denounced him as not being a decent man. I do not know what kind of a man Secretary of War Weeks is; I do not know what his antecedents have been. I do not know what his manners are, or what his rearing has been, but I am willing that mine shall be compared with his, and I will let any impartial tribunal pass upon the issue which he has raised as to who is the more decent of the two.

I stated expressly that I made no attack upon a class. I said that in too many cases the officers did make courtesans of those nurses, and I can prove it, else I would not have said it. Mr. President, before the words of Secretary Weeks were in the paper, and almost as soon as mine could reach Richmond, Va., there came to me a letter from a lady of that city, in which she says, after the usual address:

> DEAR MR. WATSON: Your charges in the paper in regard to the many evils permitted in the Army have more than aroused my interest. I sincerely trust that you can bring out full facts in open Senate.
> I was in the Army nursing service for 12 months and overseas for 7. Not only did I find it true in my own limited field of observation that officers made courtesans of nurses wherever possible, but nurses who rejected the social attentions of men in power were subjected to a multiplicity of personal and professional indignities.

For obvious reasons I will not disclose the lady's name, because it would subject her to annoyance, to a publicity which would be distasteful to the feelings of any refined woman. If I should relate to Senators what has been told to me by one of the nurses who had to repel the attempted assault of an officer, they would burn with indignation and they would feel that Secretary Weeks had not disgraced me when he said that no decent man would have said that, and I say that I could not be disgraced by any words that come from that source.

Very soon after the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] had cut me off from further disclosures on yesterday by calling for the regular order there was put into the RECORD a letter from an Army officer, Mr. John B. Lechleiter, of Nashville, Tenn., of which I will read only one paragraph, to show how he contradicts the Secretary of War and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, Senator WADSWORTH. He said:

> The writer knows of his own knowledge, from an examination of the records covering a period of several weeks, that the total number of cases in which the accused was sentenced to death was imposed was 28. Of this number 9 were carried into effect.

The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs said that during the whole war those American soldiers who were put to death in France could be counted on the fingers of his one hand. The very next morning the Secretary of War said that the number was twice that amount for the whole war, and now this officer from Nashville, who had charge of the records, says there were 9 in a few weeks. If there were 9 in a few weeks, my figures of 21 on one gallows during the entire war begin to dwindle into insignificance.

Mr. President, here is another picture of a gallows in France taken by a private soldier now living in Huntington, W. Va., and smuggled into this country. He sends it to me. Apparently, there were as many gibbets as hospitals, and I have already shown that upon one there was an arrangement made whereby three men could be hanged at once.

The young soldier who told me of the 21 men who had been hanged at Gievres in France has sent me this telegram:

> Got letter. Sent affidavit story special delivery to-night.
> CLIFFORD L. LEAR, Jr.

He is as brave a boy as ever wore a uniform. If that affidavit does not suffice, I will send for him, but if any of the members of our military clique try to go into that committee room and browbeat, intimidate, cow, and crush any of these ex-service men, they will find me there ready to combat them in the name of the public and of the Senate of the United States. They are not in France now. They can not hide things behind censorship now, with George Creel sitting on one end of the cable in France and Albert S. Burleson sitting on the other end here in America. No, the cat is out of the bag at last, and she is going to run her full race before she stops.

Here is another telegram from Aaron, Ga.:

> Yes, they hung soldiers in France without court-martial.
>
> GEORGE SCARBORO,
> Six hundred and fifth Engineers, Sergeant (first class).

He faced the enemy and he will face the nabobs of the General Staff.

Senators seem to put their minds principally upon the concrete fact of hanging without court-martial. I shall not stop to argue the legal question as to whether the officers of the Expeditionary Force in France had the right to try, condemn, and execute soldiers for crimes committed upon civilians in France. That would be a waste of time. I shall not ask whether those cases could not have been turned over to the French courts, and the American soldier tried under French law for an offense against a French citizen. Jurists may differ about that. I shall not take the time to talk of it now.

There is here a statement given to me by an ex-service man who lives in this city. His name and his address are given. He does not want to be persecuted. He is out of a job, dead broke, I suppose, as most of them are. The men who made blood puddings, financially, out of the sacrifices of these young men are not broke. We are relieving them of taxation. Here is a statement which that young man dictated to my stenographer under cross-examination by me, a statement as to the hanging of four Negro men on one gallows, at one time—soldiers, mind you, clad in the uniform and going to the firing line, where it was not the duty of Gen. Pershing to go and where nobody expected him to go.

I asked him the question, "How do you know they were hanged without trial?" He gave me this explanation. In every case of court-martial where the sentence was carried out and the victim cut down from the gallows his body was carried to the hospital to be prepared for burial. As the sailors do when they want to preserve a record, they put it in a bottle, one of the very few vessels that the earth does not corrode and which the salt water does not eat away.

In every case where there was a military execution by order of court-martial, there was placed in a bottle the record showing the name of that soldier, stating his offense, stating his trial, and giving the facts as to his sentence, so that if he should, before the resurrection and the last day, be taken up, that record should come up with him and would tell the whole world why he was lying in that grave. In these four cases there was no such record.

He gave me this gruesome detail. There was a white lady of Rochester, N. Y., who had lost her son. He had been killed on the firing line. She wanted his body back home. This very young man acted as a detail that exhumed the body of one of these negro convicts which still had the black cap drawn over his head and face; and that black body was sent to Rochester, N. Y., as the body of the son of that white woman. Her tears, when they fell upon the new-made grave, did not fall upon the grave of her son, and the flowers with which she strewed it were not strewn above where her son was sleeping. Just such a case happened in my own home county.

This same ex-service man told me of a case in Paris where a private overstayed his leave of absence for a very short while. He was violently seized and struck by the sergeant, under orders from the officer of the day, and was plunged into a bathtub of cold water, and then, in that cold uniform, drenched, dripping, he was made to lie all night upon a cement floor. This young man does not know whether the soldier died of pneumonia or not. Was there any court-martial? None whatever.

Here is a letter from the National Disabled Soldiers' League, Washington, D. C. There is no seal of secrecy about it and I am going to read it, because if I can stand here and afford to take the responsibility and whatever risk there may be in making these disclosures in this attack upon the Prussian abuses that have crept into our Army, the men who gave me the information ought to have the same courage.

MY DEAR MR. WATSON: Perhaps you would like to have the following information, so I am sending it for what it is worth to you.

I am a disabled soldier; and, while I did not actually witness any execution, I have continually heard of them through former comrades and members of my post. Mr. Arthur Manly, one of my "buddies" and a disabled soldier, told us that he witnessed five executions—

Oh, the number is climbing. This one man witnessed five. God Almighty knows how many there were. The records will never show it. I have already proved the records were expunged, destroyed—

while in France. He did not know if the victims had trials or not. Mr. Manly does not know that I am writing to you, and may not wish to be interviewed. However, he is a fine fellow, and I think he will be glad to help you with your disclosures. Mr. Manly is a student at the—

He gives the name of the school, but I can not decipher it.

You will remember that during 1918 there were so many executions in France that ex-President Wilson curtailed Gen. Pershing's authority in signing death warrants and that all such cases were referred to the Secretary of War for final action. I shudder—

But that is enough.

Here is another signed statement of an ex-service man, who dictated it to my secretary in my office. I was not even present. He was stationed at Is-sur-Tille, France, from July, 1918, until June, 1919, and he saw the gallows within the camp reservation upon which two soldiers were hanged during the year 1919. So the number is still climbing. One of the executed was a Negro charged with rape; the other a white man, the charges against him being unknown to this witness. That is enough.

CLEVELAND, OHIO.

DEAR SENATOR: Having read articles in the Cleveland newspapers the last couple of days concerning executions of members of the American Expeditionary Forces, and then seeing the interest you are taking in the matter, I thought I would drop you a few lines to tell you that I have two photographs of a hanging which took place at Is-sur-Tille, France. I, William J. Gibbons, a former private in Company B, Twenty-third United States Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces, will be glad to hear from you at once.

* * * * * * *

One photo is before and the other is after the hanging.

Here is a letter from Savannah, Ga., from a man whom I do not know. His name is A. Y. Chancellor. There is not the seal of secrecy upon his letter. I read the important part of it:

I can not give you the names of those who suffered from or committed these two tragedies spoken of below, because we were so handicapped at the time by the censorship of our mail that we thought it was useless to take down such information and endeavor to get it back to the States, but when I sat and listened to my bunkie relate each instance, looking me square in the face with tears rolling from his true blue eyes, I knew that it was the truth and that God was there to hear as he spake from trembling lips.

First. An offensive was under way when one of the men was torn in the side by a piece of shrapnel; he was being picked up to be carried to the first-aid station when the officer in charge yelled out, "Let him lay; it will be cheaper to the Government for him to die." He was calling "Mother" when his company marched away and left him.

Second. The company was in action; a line sergeant had been gassed and was dumb; the officer in charge called down the line to this sergeant, and as he was working his mouth in a dumb fashion, trying to reply, the officer shot him dead because he did not speak.

And yet we find that Secretary Weeks calls me an indecent man. How decent he is I do not know and do not care. I will say this, within the bounds of parliamentary language: I have no mental respect for a judge who announces a decision before hearing the testimony.

The General of the Army is not my superior in the Government service nor yours; we are his superiors, and we may have to let him know it, and we will let him know it if it requires a lesson to teach it to him. He is not in France; he is back here in America, where, thank God, the people still rule.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. STANLEY. Does the Senator from Georgia at this late day mean to intimate that an elective officer, an ordinary Senator, an ambassador from the once sovereign State, is, without lese majeste, to be compared with the head of any bureau?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, the Senator's question, as usual, answers itself.

NASHVILLE, TENN., November 4.

While here to-day Gen. John J. Pershing asked to be quoted in reference to the charge of Senator TOM WATSON that American soldiers had been hanged overseas without trial. He said: "It is the most outrageous and untrue accusation that could be possible to make, and absolutely without foundation."

I might believe that the general had been misquoted if I did not have the same clipping sent by the International News Service to another paper. When the General of the Army publicly and through the press denounces a Senator as a liar, he had better remember that it is within the power of the Senate to bring him here and reprimand him. It is in our power to do it, and the time may come when we will do it. If he talks about many more Senators in that way, it will be done. We have as yet no Kaiser who says, "Me and God"; we have no military staff which treats the civilian as so much mud to be trodden under foot—not yet; it may come, but it has not yet come. I will not lower myself to the level of either Secretary Weeks or Gen. Pershing by indulging in abuse. I simply content myself with saying that, in my judgment, it was a great impropriety for either one of these members of the public service to publicly condemn another without the slightest investigation.

Here is a telegram from Parkersburg, W. Va.:

Senator TOM WATSON:

While you are proving charges of the illegal hangings in France, please take up the matter of the same sort of treatment at San Antonio, Tex., particularly the case of Albert Purcell, of Cincinnati, Ohio, of whom the War Department will give no information to prove that he was not killed illegally.

Secretary Weeks has said that if I had applied to him for information I could have obtained it. Senators, I made that application, and no reply was made. My files will show that I applied to the War Department for information and got no response.

I read another telegram, which is from Waycross, Ga.:

Have the promise of two or three real affidavits. Think I will get three others to-night from Horace Steedley, Fred Yeomans, and Joe Gaskins of being starved, cussed, and abused, freezing to death, and denied fire, both in the United States and in France. Two of them volunteered this statement to me this afternoon. They said that words could not express what they went through with; that fighting in the trenches would be no comparison with treatment they received at the hands of officers.

Here is a telegram from Winston-Salem, N. C.:

Your paragraph that food was piled mountain high in France has interested me intensely. I can furnish you evidence that in St. Aighan, France, I and several thousand buddies suffered untold agonies for the want of food that was not proportionally as it should have been. I will furnish evidence if necessary.

DECATUR B. BARNES.

Here is one from Washington, D. C., the Munsey Building, signed by Kenneth C. Robinson:

DEAR SENATOR WATSON: It was in July of 1918 that a private of the One hundred and eighth Field Artillery was tied up to a tree by his wrists with a rope suspended over the limb, with only the balls of his feet touching the ground, and he was left in that condition from 7.30 p. m. until 3 a. m. next day. There was a guard placed around him with orders to fire on whoever came close to him. He had never had any court-martial, and the only thing against him was going into a French town and getting too much wine on board. It was under the command of Col. E. St. John Greble, One hundred and eighth Field Artillery, Twenty-eighth Division

I also knew of Col. Greble knocking a prisoner down while his feet were tied. The prisoner was on bread and water, I think, and this colonel wanted the prisoner to work, which he refused to do on bread and water.

Col. Greble bought about 20 dresses and forced the prisoners to wear them. He forced them to clean their teeth with issue soap, and made them take cold shower baths at 4 o'clock every afternoon during the wintertime.

United States soldiers dressed up like women! Why, an Indian would consider that an insult almost worse than death, to be dressed like a woman, because, after all, a man is a man, and only the effeminate want to wear the feminine dress.

This one comes from the southern district of New York:

While the Three hundred and sixty-ninth was stationed in a small French village between their trench service, one of their men was killed by an officer, a lieutenant. The man killed was a sentry on guard and challenged the officer who was leaving camp. When the guard halted the officer, he (the lieutenant) pulled his revolver and shot the guard dead. Col. Hayward probably can tell you more about this.

Mr. President the Duke of Wellington, called the Iron Duke because of the sternness of his discipline and the unbroken quality of his courage, lives in anecdote for one occurrence. He was a great hunter of foxes. He rode to hounds with great enjoyment. One day when he, at the head of his friends and their pack of hounds, was trying to take a short cut through a farmer's barnyard the farmer with his hay fork in his hand stopped him. The Duke said: "I am the Duke of Wellington." The farmer said: "I don't care who you are; this is my place, and you can not come on it." The Duke tipped his hat and said: "You are quite right, sir," and rode off.

Once upon a time Napoleon Bonaparte tried to pass a sentry, and was stopped by the guard. He said, "Why, I am Napoleon." The guard said, "I don't care who you are. I have got my orders, and if you take another step I will shoot you dead," and Napoleon promoted him for it. He had obeyed orders; and here this lieutenant killed a sentinel who was doing his duty, just as they killed sentries who went to sleep from exhaustion after working 20 hours a day.

Here is a letter from Elmira, N. Y. It shows that it was written by a man of no education. He uses almost as bad grammar as we sometimes hear here in the Senate:

I have read your statements, and all of them are the truth. I seen two niggers hung in Java, France, and spent considerable time in Paris under "Hard Boiled" Smith.

Now, count them up. I have already gone beyond the Senator from New York and his five fingers, supposing that he has only five on one hand. I have already gone beyond the Secretary of War with his 10 men. We are going on further and further, and the further we go the worse it gets, and the more we stir it the worse it smells.

TITUSVILLE, PA.

DEAR SIR: I understand you are having an investigation on soldiers being hung over in France. Well, I want to state that the last day of January I witnessed a nigger being hung—

How many does that make?—

right back of our hospital in the morning about 6 o'clock at a little town called Bazwa—

Which he evidently does not know how to spell—

a hospital base center about 3 miles from Neufchateau; and the colonel—

Lyon, apparently—was in charge of the court-martial of that district. Of course I do not know what kind of proceeding through court he had; but if I can be of any assistance to you I would gladly do so.

And he signs his name—

William T. Collins.

Here is another letter. This one is also from New York, from Harry K. Walmer, ex-sergeant, Army Service Corps. The essential part of it is this:

Kindly accept my congratulations for your bold attempt to bring the guilty to justice, which, if you will accomplish, will forever place your name—

And so forth; but the connection is this:

I take pleasure in offering my testimony of not hangings, but cold-blooded murder, at Cheils and Hotel Rue St. Ann. Would you like to ask The Adjutant General of the United States Army to produce the letter files of the headquarters Rue de Tillist in Paris? They will show for themselves. I personally know the contents of these files. Would you like to have me testify what officer instructed the enlisted personnel to destroy important reports about the condition at Bastile Prison? I can furnish that testimony under oath.

Destroying the files! As every lawyer knows, one of the strongest evidences of guilt is destruction by the accused person of testimony sought by the prosecution to prove his guilt.

Here is a letter from Newark, N. J. The New Jersey Senators seem to have retired from the conflict. They are not in evidence. Yesterday they had on their war paint. To-day apparently they have gone off beyond the reach of attack, because the attack which their paper virtually made on them—not that I made it—was renewed in their paper, a copy of which I received to-day. Let them answer their paper in their paper. I do not attack them.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator from Georgia recognize the military virtues there are in a masterly retreat?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. In order that—

He who fights and runs away
May live to fight another day—

Yes; I do.

As I say, this letter is from Newark, N. J. Speaking of a New York boy, the writer says:

This fine young fellow, under a standing order, was taken to a faucet. Cold water was poured over him for 20 minutes. He was fully clothed at the time. He was beaten by six guards attached to the Sixth Cavalry camp. He died. He was buried with full military honors.

Mr. REED. Well, that ought to have satisfied him.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Here is a letter from the head of the United American War Veterans, of New York. The date is November 4, this year. After the usual address to me, it reads:

DEAR SIR: As national commander of the United American War Veterans, I heartily indorse the stand that you have taken for a deep investigation of the system which operated in the Army during the war. It was the same combination that assailed Brig. Gen. Samuel T. Ansell and endeavored to discredit him in his exposure of their tactics.

As a veteran of three wars—the Porto Rican campaign, the Philippine insurrection, and the World War—I have seen men strung up by the thumbs, their teeth knocked out with the butt of revolvers, spread-eagled in a tropical sun, and numerous other forms of heinous punishment.

You can make my letter and charges public.

Senators, think of that, a private soldier having his teeth knocked out by the butt end of a revolver by his officer and then spread out on a wheel, his arms as far apart as they could be pulled, his legs as far apart as they could be spread, and exposed to a sun which must have blistered him before he had been exposed to it an hour.

Here is another from Washington, D. C.:

I will be willing to appear before the investigation committte of the Senate relating to your charges. I fear no one of the Army officers, and the whole War Department means nothing to me.

"I fear no one."

There is your American. When that spirit dies out every star on the flag will have sunk beneath the horizon, and every color will have faded from its red folds.

I fear no one, and the whole War Department means nothing to me.

He signs himself, "Wilkins B. Yost," and gives the number of his room in the Y. M. C. A.

Mr. President, I will ask to have inserted into the RECORD without reading the very letter which I was reading when my friend, the senior Senator from Massachusetts, interrupted me yesterday. It is a letter from Mr. Ernest M. Jeffery, and it speaks for itself about the hospital and the man that he saw hung on that gallows.

There being no objection, the letter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS,
UNITED STATES NAVAL HOSPITAL,
WARD UNIT NO. 6,
Great Lakes, Ill.

DEAR SENATOR WATSON: If you will remember, I was the ex-soldier that wrote you in regard to my claim. I received training under section 2, but I had a terrible nervous breakdown and had to go to the hospital.

I have been reading in the paper of the charges you made of hanging American soldiers. I want to say you are telling the truth. I saw one taken from the hospital at Bazoille, France, and hung right on the grounds on a cold, bitter morning, and, dear Senator WATSON, the dirtiest kind of hanging. They tied a sand bag to his feet before he dropped to be sure he broke his neck. This was in the month of February, 1919, one Friday morning. This I saw with my own eyes. The gallows is a wooden structure painted red, and only set back a very short ways from the wards of the hospitals in what I would call an alcove in the mountain side. I am ready to swear to this at any time if I can help you.

Yours, respectfully,

ERNEST M. JEFFERY.

Claim No. 323321.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Here is the affidavit of Joseph D. Conwell, sent to me from Philadelphia, received by me this morning, and telling how he saw the Negro soldier hanged, clothed in the full uniform of the United States Army.

I ask that I be allowed to put that in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the affidavit referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA,
County of Philadelphia:

Joseph E. Conwell, being duly sworn according to law, deposes and says that he was enlisted as a private of the first class in the United States Army, serving in the Evacuation Hospital No. 6, with the American Expeditionary Forces in France from April, 1918, until April, 1919; and that during June or July of 1918 he witnessed the execution of an American Negro soldier in uniform at Bazoilles-Sur-Meuse, the said soldier having been hung on a scaffold especially constructed for the purpose. He further swears that there was rumor that the said soldier had been tried by a general court-martial at Neufchateau; he also further swears that 100 members of his own unit witnessed the said execution and also a great many American soldiers of other units, among them an Army chaplain and other American officers.

JOSEPH D. CONWELL.

Sworn and subscribed before me this 4th day of November, 1921.
[SEAL.] G. E. NITZSCHE, Notary Public.
(Commission expires January 18, 1925.)

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Much more could I put into the RECORD, Mr. President, but I have no desire to fatigue Senators or to pile up cumulative evidence. I will say this: That while the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who evidently drew up his motion in great haste and who evidently overlooked the wording of our Constitution, seemed to put me in the attitude of being compelled to answer elsewhere than in this Chamber for what I said here in debate, I took the attitude out of respect for myself, my State, my colleagues, and their States, that no Senator could be compelled to answer questions elsewhere for what he said here.

That part of the motion was afterwards stricken out, and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] cordially cooperated in striking it out. Now that that feature has disappeared, I assure the committee of the most cordial cooperation upon my part. I will give them every scrap of testimony in my possession. I will give them all that which hereafter comes to me. My purpose is to serve the public, to serve the Army, to serve the Government. Let us have officers in the Army whose hearts are humane, men who treat privates while on duty with rigid discipline when necessary but who will not overlook the common rights of men, which no uniform can take from them; and let them treat our men, when off duty, as their equals. It is so in the French army.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. With pleasure.

Mr. STANLEY. Aside from the merits of this controversy, I wish to call to the attention of the Senator from Georgia another phase of the subject he is now discussing. What the Senator from Georgia is pleased to call the Prussianizing of the Army is, after all, but an incident in the Prussianizing of America. The trouble is that in the Army and out, in Congress and out, in the Senate and out, in the field and in the factory, in civil and military life, we are drifting perilously, pathetically away from the most precious heritage of the Saxon race—the independence, the dignity, yea, and the sanctity of a mere man for a' that.

Those in power, clothed with some petty authority, forget that without authority, without shoulder straps in war, without a police baton or star in peace, man is the noblest work of God, not a little lower but much higher than the angels in heaven.

That spirit permeated our civil life and military life for 1,000 years. That spirit permeated every army that was ever raised in England or Ireland or Scotland or Wales, from the Battle of Hastings to the Battle of Waterloo and beyond. That spirit has permeated the armies of the South to even a greater extent than the armies of the North, and in this connection I wish to give the Senator a simple illustration, which might go as a companion piece to what he has said.

The great John C. Breckinridge, of Kentucky, expelled by the Senate for his loyalty to the South, was Adonis in love, Mars in war, and Ulysses in counsel, framed in the rich prodigality of nature——

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. And the handsomest man who ever rode a horse.

Mr. STANLEY. The handsomest man of his day; as brave as Julius Caesar and as tender as a woman.

He commanded the "Orphan" brigade, Mr. President, 7,000 men whom no man ever lived to lead into a second field of carnage or of glory. They left all their leaders dead on the field of fame. Seven thousand they went out, and 600 they came home. They closed all the gaps of the Army of the Tennessee.

My father went out with a hundred and more of them and came back with less than a dozen, and all but two shot all to pieces. No more martial men ever careered over a field of fame; not they of the Light Brigade at Balaklava; not the Old Guard in the blood-stained pass of Ohain; never since men armed themselves to settle upon the reeking, reeling field of carnage and conquest, the mastery of nations; never since they fought with wooden clubs until the day of poison gas had any man ever led gamer men than they to glory or to death.

On one occasion a captain in the "Orphan" brigade commanded a private to sweep about his tent, and the private told him, if such language is permissible in this dignified body, to go to hell; where he should have sent him for such a command.

The captain sent the man to the guardhouse, and somebody reported the incident to Breckinridge. And then the great rebel chieftain got on his horse and rode down to that captain's tent, whipping his horse with his slouch hat, and said, "Sir, I understand you have ordered a private to sweep about your tent, and he has refused, and you sent him to the guardhouse." The captain answered, "I did, sir," and Gen. Breckinridge replied, "I want you to understand that when a private refuses to voluntarily sweep out my tent I will do it myself. They are not menials in the 'Orphan' brigade. They are all gentlemen, and you have no right to command one of them to do a menial service. Now you go to the guardhouse and apologize to the soldier you have insulted and sweep about your own tent, or you will take his place."

That was the spirit that makes every survivor of the Lost Cause ready to-day to fight for the honor of his superior officer, and makes him regard the memory of the dead Lee, Jackson, Johnson, and Breckinridge as a sacred thing; that makes the memory of the Lost Cause like an old, sweet song, as holy and as inspiring as "a sevenfold chorus of hallelujahs and harping symphonies" to all of us whose blood is the blood of the brave and valiant few, who followed the Stars and Bars to glory and to death.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President, I will ask that two or three other letters of the same tenor as those I have read be included in the RECORD, and with two or three historical references to illustrate my feeling about this I will close.

Every reader here will remember that when our ancestors went out from Germany to conquer France they were led by King Clovis. They conquered the city of Soissons and rifled the cathedral. They looted the town, and all the spoils were heaped up and were to be divided equally among the warriors.

Clovis, their king for the moment, had been requested by the bishop to save a precious vase and give it back to the cathedral. When the spoils were heaped up and the soldiers were standing in line about to draw lots each for his share, King Clovis said to his army, "I ask you to give to me in addition to my share this vase"; and one of the private soldiers, striking it with his battle axe, knocked it into a thousand pieces and said to the King, "You get nothing here except your share."

During the time when Napoleon Bonaparte was leading his army one of his marshals was Vandamme. One day Napoleon saw one of his clerks in tears, and he said to the young man, "What are you crying about?" The clerk replied, "Marshal Vandamme has hurt my feelings. He insulted me."

Napoleon went to his marshal and fixed him with that eagle eye, before which all men quailed. He said, "Marshal Vandamme, return to that office and apologize to that clerk," and the marshal went and apologized.

During our Civil War one of the bravest leaders that we had was Gen. Pat Cleburne, killed afterwards at the Battle of Franklin, Tenn. Before that he had given offense to a private. This incident was related to me by Sol Andrews, a justice of the peace before whom I began to practice law before I was old enough to vote. He told me that he saw and heard every word. The private said to Gen. Cleburne, "If you will get off that horse and strip yourself of those epaulets, I will give you the blankest whipping you ever had in your life." Gen. Cleburne dismounted, shucked his coat, went into the fight, and got licked, and took it like a man.

Gen. Lee's men so loved him that when he went into an exposed position Gen. John B. Gordon, of Georgia, seized his bridle rein, turned his horse around, and while all the privates shouted, "Lee to the rear; Lee to the rear," led him back to where he belonged.

Many times Gen. Grant and Gen. Sheridan and other Union soldiers dismounted from their horses, or had some aid-de-camp to do it, in order that a wounded soldier might ride. That is why their men loved them. That is why their men would have died for them. If a chieftain, a general, would be loved, he must love. After all it comes to that. Whatever love we get in this world is the reflection of the love which we feel for others.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, in that connection it would be well for the Senator to tell the story of Gen. Washington's chef, who refused to eat the shad while there was a hungry soldier in the hospital.

APPENDIX.

ATHENS, GA., November 3, 1921.

Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: If you will kindly accept this statement, why, I am more than glad to make it and will swear to it. I seen a boy shot down in cold blood at Camp Wheeler, Ga. This boy went on the sick report one morning and the doctor marked him "duty," and the rule at the Thirty-first Division stockade was if a man got marked duty when he went up on the sick report was he did not get any dinner and had to work like the devil. This boy went on and worked that morning and when they refused to give his dinner, why, he refused to work that afternoon, and one corporal got on this boy with a club, and when he threw up his arm to protect his head, why the other corporal run up from behind and shot him in the back. I can give this boy's name and the corporal who shot him; the boy was named Holley, or Halley, that was shot, and the man that done the shooting was named Crawford, and was in the One hundred and sixth Military Police; and if I mistake not Dick Russel was in command of his company. You can take this or leave it, just as you please, but I will make this statement on oath any time you want it. I would like to make it before any body of men, for I am not the only man that seen this. I remain,

Sincerely, yours,

Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In view of the revelations now being made to the public, I feel it to be an opportune time to mention the story told to myself and one other, who happens to be in this city. The story was told to us by a young Belgian woman in Neuville, which is a small village near Chamslitte. It depicted the sadness of a young soldier who was shot at the instigation of a French girl of Franois, a near-by village. It seems that this soldier had been keeping company with the girl for some time, presumably sleeping with her. However, she raised a "hue and cry" one night, and a French military police rushed into the girl's room and arrested the American soldier, and he was subsequently tried by court-martial and shot. The narrater seemed to think that it was all due to the boy's failure to pay her the sum she demanded of him, as she was a woman of ill repute and notorious, considering which the question arises, was it a bona fide military court; and if so, was it just in it's decision?

The narrator claimed to have known the soldier quite well. However, being familiar with her traits, I'm sure she told an impartial story.

I think the victim was a member of the Thirty-fifth Division and hailed from Michigan. The time being spring, 1918.

You can verify this from the records, and in the interim, I am,

Yours, to command,

C. D. RICHARDS,

MY DEAR MR. WATSON: I only regret that I can't be of real service to you in your great work in regard to France. * * *

I had five brothers in the United States Army during the past World War, as they call it, and only had one to cross the "Pond." And I would be glad for you to get in touch with him, as he can give you some good information in regard to the way he was treated in France, as well as others.

I also give you the name of a man who says that he would walk to Washington to get to testify what he knows. He says that he has helped to build those infernal gallows for the soldiers to be hanged on; also has seen soldiers shot down without any cause by their superior officers.

The Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON,
United States Senator from Georgia,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to my telegram of November 2, and your reply thereto of November 3, 1921, I beg to advise that it will be necessary to secure affidavits from various parties for full information as to the following:

During the time that the United States were taking part in the conflict between Germany and her allies and the Allies, consisting of the British, French, Italian, and American forces, there were two battalions from North and South Carolina that were placed in mass formation and forced up to the German lines, where they were gassed by the Germans. They were stood so close together that their bodies stood erect after death; part of them lay in heaps after they were put to death. They were placed in action before the German lines with practically no training. This was done by the officers in charge for minor misdemeanors that had taken place while they were being transported overseas to France. About 448 American soldiers were drowned off the Irish coast and the transports were deliberately rammed together, and the cause of the catastrophe was reported to the Navy Department of the United States that the transports had been torpedoed, which was not true according to the statement of surviving soldiers.

In some cases where the American Artillery were in action the shells fell short and landed in the front-line trenches, killing our men. Men that were in charge of the Artillery called the attention of the officers that were in charge that the shells were falling in the front-line trenches and killing their own soldiers. These men that suggested the information were immediately taken and confined in the guardhouse for suggesting this information.

I was given this information by men that were in the service and saw these occurrences, and to substantiate the above it will be necessary to get their evidence in person or by affidavit. Awaiting your further services, I beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

J. J. FRY.

NOVEMBER 3, 1921.

SENATOR WATSON, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Thank God for what you are doing and for your splendid courage. You know the way to talk to them, and it is your best weapon.

Try and have an investigation of doings at Gievres, near Voivres, France; ask how many men were found dead on the roadside, and what was done with them; how much of an inquest was held; how many men were badly clubbed by the M. P's. Inquire into the living conditions of the nurses there, and find out how often the officers spent the night in the nurses' quarters. Inquire into the treatment of sick men when the medical officers refused to visit the wards because it was raining. Inquire into food conditions, when the men had only canned tomatoes and beans for weeks at a time. No food; one barnyard lantern to each 100 beds; no call; wet beds; no pillows except wet straw; no towels; and not a bit of a rag for the gas victims to use for eyes and nose. Inquire into the riot on Christmas and New Years, 1919, when the men forced the officers to quit the dance and retire, because they had reached a point where they wanted the American people to know what dreadful conditions existed; the men demanded to be put under arrest, and dared the officers to punish them, because they knew America would hear of it. Call some of the Fifth Marines and ask about the lieutenant who damned their souls and had to face 100 men and take his curse back. Call some of the chief nurses like Miss Bloomfield and Miss Ubank and hear their account, and ask why and how nurses were kept that disgraced the Army. Ask why Miss Gold, Army nurse, died in Coblenz. Ask why when nurse told of disgraceful conditions she was forced to put it in writing and sign her name to it, and how she was treated afterwards. Ask about the officers taking nurses out in closed cars on lonely roads with lights out at Gievres and what happened. Inquire how many officers got drunk and played sick with a 98 degree temperature, spending weeks in bed, having a day and night nurse. I never heard about men being hung, but saw about everything else done to them. Ask how many men were thrown overboard and reported "died of flu." Call some American nurses who served with the British and make them tell of conditions in the United States Army when they joined it. You are dead right, Senator, and I only hope you will be able to prove it, but I fear they will "break you if you succeed."

Our generals never knew and never wanted to know what was being done; they never got off their perch to find out. Ask the French and English; they know, and wondered at the humanity of Americans. Half the United States Army was rotten and cruel beyond belief. I am watching developments keenly, and if I see I can help will make myself known; until then my best wishes are with you, and may you prove all you charge.

JUST AN OLD ARMY NURSE.

NEW YORK, November 4, 1921.

Hon. THOMAS E. WATSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: If you will look up the cases recommended for trial but dropped by the Twenty-sixth Division, I think you will find that a sergeant of Company A, One hundred and first Machine Gun Battalion, Twenty-sixth Division, shot a private who attempted to dispute the word of the sergeant. This happened late in May or early in June, 1918, in the woods east of Seicheprey (Meurtheet-Moselle) in the "Toul Sector." I think the sergeant's name was Grady, but you can refer to any roster of the Twenty-sixth Division taken about June 1, 1918. Write to the Y. D. Club of Boston, 100 Huntington Avenue, for their present home addresses, and soon find witnesses to the affair. They may not remember the date, but will recall it as following the battle of Xivray-Marvoisin in the Toul sector.

HENRY WELLS.

DURHAM, N. C., November 3, 1921.

Senator TOM WATSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I admire the stand you are taking for the persecuted and mistreated soldiers. I do not think the death penalty should ever be left with the war men only. Henry MacManus, an ex-service man, a Negro, has just left my office. He was stationed at Camp Hill, Newport News, Va. This Negro was a sergeant or some minor officer in the labor battalion. He tells me he saw with his own eyes two white boys cruelly mistreated at the above-named camp. They were not hanged. But they had the next thing to it. They were worked in all kinds of weather. Sometimes in mud and water above their knees, and they were knocked and beat and kicked around at the will of their persecutors. Will you please imagine the feelings of those two southern white men working in mud and water over their knees in the winter time in the State of Virginia to such an extent until it disturbed the emotions of this Negro soldier, Henry McMannus, notwithstanding this Negro enlisted in the State of South Carolina. The Negroes of South Carolina and Georgia are supposed to hate southern white men on account of the lynching hounds in those two States. I admire your stand. * * * Let the truth be known and justice done. No wonder many say that they would die here rather than return to France in military service. Fight them on the floor of the Senate and let the public know.

Yours, truly,

D. E. CALDWELL,
524 East Pettigrew Street, Durham, N. C.

WASHINGTON, D. C., Wednesday, November 3, 1921.

Senator THOMAS WATSON.

HONORABLE SIR: I extend my heartiest congratulations to you for your expose of the Army hangings. I wish the House of Representatives and the Senate were full of men like you.

I know what it is to be the underdog. I was a marine in Santo Domingo, and when I absented myself with three other marines the four of us were held seven months before being tried. I served two years and one month in prison for that, my first offense. There were some keepsakes taken from me at Fort Ozama, San Domingo, which were never returned, and I was refused receipts for them.

The three other fellows and myself were denied water for two weeks (we had coffee, however). The Dominican Government furnished us with underwear when we became lousy (the marine authorities would not). At Monte Christi marines were thrown into a pit and there forced to languish day after day, with the scorching sun pouring down upon them and centipedes crawling over them, until at last they mutinied, led by a big private named Kuhar, and they forced officers to wait on them and shine their shoes. The mutiny was quelled and the big private imprisoned, accused of being a socialist agitator.

We were compelled to sleep on a bare cement floor, while the rain poured in under the door. We were denied mosquito netting; thus poisonous insects were ever on our trail, rheumatism began to take its toll, and leprosy might have gotten us had we continued, for it is a scientific fact that leprous sores can be acquired by the flesh coming into contact with the soil of Santo Domingo.

We mutinied, and received five days, bread and water, while the "enemy" slept in hammocks across the way.

The hard work they put me at caused me to strain my heart; ever since, I have had a leaking valve or "micro murmur." Such experiences brutalized the marines and they took it out on the natives. Some of them raped women, another carved his initials on a fallen native's chest, while another apparently knocked a native's eye out with a lump of clay.

At Portsmouth Prison the "graybacks" were treated like dogs. In 'third class" they received mush two times a day, and could not smoke. Some stayed in three and four months, cracking rocks every day. A piece of flying rock ripped my arm open. We had no bread fit to eat for three days, so 79 of us mutinied. Sixty men were sent out to work with iron-handled shovels in the dead of winter without gloves; they mutinied. Men went mad regularly. I have seen 16-year-old boys serving 10-year sentences for talking back to an officer.

Aboard the prison ship Southery we were forced to get up between midnight and morning to go "down below" and hear vulgar songs and stories by a fellow named Eddie. (All this was under Osborne.)

I was struck in the eye with a large lump of coal on a barge at Portsmouth, but was not allowed to go to the "sick bay" till work was over.

We had to work beneath apple trees with apples all around us, but were not permitted to touch them. If a man picked up a half-rotten apple out of some horse dung he had the alternative of not eating it or being shot.

The Red Cross deprived us of part of our tobacco money. Sometimes we had to stand at attention for hours late at night before we were granted leave to go to bed.

When inspections were to take place conditions became ideal until after the visitors left, then they grew worse.

Osborne used to call mass meetings to praise England and make fun of Theodore Roosevelt; but I guess it will all come out in the wash, Senator.

Sincerely, yours,

EDWARD J. IRVINE.

P. S.: If I get shot for these statements, please bring flowers to my grave.

FRIDAY, November 4, 1921.

Hon. TOM WATSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: I have listened with great interest to the statements you have made on the floor of the Senate Chamber relative to atrocities to American soldiers in France and to the letters of supporting evidence relative thereto; personally, I had never conceived that such a terrible atrocity as hanging men without trial or court-martial could take place in the civilized army of a supposedly civilized country; but I will endeavor to cite a few examples of what I term atrocities which occurred in the armies of the American Expeditionary Forces.

FIRST CASE.

During the terrible influenza epidemic in France I was stationed at Camp De Souge, near Bordeaux, France; men were dying there in great numbers from influenza; my regiment was taken toll of, approximately 14 men of the One hundred and forty-fifth (First Utah) Field Artillery were to be buried. In making preparations for the burial of these men the regimental chaplain, who was the Hon. Brigham H. Roberts (a man well known to both Senator SMOOT and Senator KING, of that State), discovered that the medical authorities (or whosoever had charge of the burial of men) were burying men in such a disgraceful manner as wrapping them up in sheets, burlap, or any other cloth they could find and dumping them, so to speak, into large holes in the ground, many men being buried in this manner in the same hole. The good chaplain of the One hundred and forty-fifth Field Artillery immediately took steps to see that the men of his regiment were given decent and respectable burial in coffins and with the proper military ceremonies.

SECOND CASE.

——— ———, of the One hundred and forty-fifth (First Utah) Field Artillery, was confined in a ward in a hospital in southern France, near Bordeaux, with a severe case of influenza. This officer cited to me and to many others whom I know of his experiences in this hospital. His story was that he was in a ward which accommodated about 20 men (20 beds). Every night along about midnight a nurse and a doctor would come into the ward. They would pick out the men in the weakest condition and give them some sort of hypodermic injection. In the course of a half hour or thereabouts the nurse would come back with stretcher bearers. They would lift the body of a man from his bed to the stretcher. The nurse would place a blanket snugly around the then dead man and remark loudly, so that every other man in the ward would hear her, "I must cover him warmly so as he won't get chilled." This performance happened every single night he was there, which was several weeks, and the men they carried out, wrapped warmly in blankets, were great numbers. This ——— ———, of the One hundred and forty-fifth Field Artillery, had the same experience as the other men, "partially"; they came in to give him his shot, but he refused to be shot. To protect himself and save his life, he took a piece of iron bar from the cot he was lying on and fought the nurse and doctor off. He lay there in his weakened condition all night awake, afraid to fall asleep for fear that he would never wake up. The next day he left the hospital without sanction, I understand, and to-day he is a well, hale, and hearty man, as many others who were carried out might have been had they had the temerity to refuse the shot, so to speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POINDEXTER in the chair). The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. It seems to me that there is no excuse on the part of Senators on either side of the aisle to vote against that amendment. We can raise the money this way and square the account with our soldiers. As the Senator from Missouri has pointed out, the average taxpayer will bear none of this burden. Small capital invested in the East, North, West, or South will not have to pay any of it. The man of moderate means will not be taxed one coin. The people of the Republic, the great consuming mass, will not pay one cent of it.

But the big profiteers, the men who remained 3,000 miles from the battle field during the war in Europe, will be called upon to pay it. Not only were they 3,000 miles away, far removed from danger, but they were making money, making money in colossal sums, accumulating their millions and hundreds of millions. Millionaires sprung up, thousands of them.

Danger was removed from America and the surviving soldiers returned to their homes. After the boys returned and every brave heart in America hailed them with delight we found these pompous profiteers coming to the Republican Party and demanding that that party, if given control of the Government, should take off the big excess-profits tax imposed to help pay the war debt. We found that party, when it came into power, proceeding to do exactly what the profiteer wanted done. The profiteer could not wait, but the soldier was compelled to wait. He who bared his breast upon the firing line in France and offered his life for his country had to wait. So they postponed the bill that sought to give the soldier adjusted compensation.

The big profiteer who had amassed his millions here at home while the war was raging in Europe had his excess-profits tax wiped off the statute books, $450,000,000 in a lump, while 500,000 ex-service men are out of employment and cruelly neglected by the party in power.

Senators, I appeal to your love of country and to your sense of justice and I appeal to your sympathy and to your pity, if you have any. Have these ex-service men got to come here with their hats in their hands and beg the political bosses of the party in power to give them simple justice? Is their appeal to fall on deaf ears? Shall they be turned away empty-handed and sorely disappointed while a Republican Congress does the bidding of the big profiteers?

What would these men have done if the Kaiser had been successful on the battle fields of France? Have you forgotten, Senators, what he said he was going to do? Standing upon the plains of France, dressed in his imperial robes, this mightiest military monarch of modern times looked toward Paris and said, "On to Paris and world dominion." What else did he say? When the battle line was bending back closer and closer to Paris and back nearer and nearer to the English Channel, what did he say? "The victory is mine, and I am going to impose $40,000,000,000 indemnity upon the United States."

Forty billion dollars! And but for the intrepid warriors of our country, the bravest boys that ever shouldered gun or drew a battle blade, we would now be trying to raise the money to pay $40,000,000,000 of indemnity. They stood between us and the overthrow of our Government. They stood between us and the loss of our liberty. They saved the civilization and the liberty of the world. But those who made money by the millions out of the dire need of the Government in time of war are given preference over these boys now. Senators, can you excuse such conduct? We asked you to give land to those who wanted it. The Government donated millions of acres of land years ago to the railroads of the country, but you postpone the measure that seeks to give some of these boys homesteads. The soldier can wait.

Now the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has presented a plan to use excess-profits taxes to pay the debt due our soldiers. Surely the men who have made their millions can give some of them to square this account with the boys who saved the life of the Nation. But you say no, and you are not going to permit us to have that money for this purpose.

Excess profits! The very name of it, as I said a few days ago, suggests that it is an unreasonable profit. A fair profit? Every man is entitled to it. A reasonable profit? Everyone is entitled to that. But big excess profits nobody is entitled to it in a great free Government, and yet they got it and through it they have accumulated many millions. Now we come and ask for access to these mountains of big excess profits. We say, let us dig in and take enough of it to give these 500,000 ex-service men a place to eat, a place to sleep, and a shelter to cover them. But they tell us, "No; the profiteers will not permit that."

Who is in control of this Government? The Republican Party carried the House and the Senate. They carried it in 1918 and locked the wheels of the Government, and after that the Democratic Party was then unable to do anything. But now you Republicans have the President, you have the House, and you have the Senate, the House by 150 or 160 majority, the Senate by more than 20 majority, and a President in the White House; and yet the soldiers who saved the Republic,

God bless them, are unable to have a just and fair settlement with the Government for which they fought and suffered in lands beyond the sea.

Senators, why do you not act on this matter now? Are you going to play politics with these men? They have just been in session at Kansas City, and they have arraigned your party and your policy of neglect, of cruel treatment, and now we are told by your leaders that you are going to enact some sort of a bonus bill before July next year. Next year is election year. God pity these 500,000 ex-service men; they have got to go through the coming winter and suffer privations and hardships, while they wait upon you to play politics in the interest of the pompous profiteer.

The man who made millions out of the war and who will not contribute freely and help pay the obligations of his Government incurred in that war in the hour of the Nation's peril is a bad citizen to start with; he is not the ideal citizen by any means. Yet we see the Republican Party holding up the profiteers and patting him and petting him and showing him favors, while they slap the soldiers of the Republic in the face. That is precisely what you are doing.

Senators on the other side of the Chamber, I indict your party for its cruel neglect and brutal treatment of the American soldier. There is no excuse for your un-American conduct. I was the first Senator, I believe, to make the suggestion that we take a portion of the debt which the Allies owe us and square the account with the American soldier. We loaned to the Allies $10,000,000,000, and out of it we are told that they have given to their soldiers adjusted compensation. Great Britain settled with her soldiers; heroic France has squared the account with hers; Italy has settled with her boys; but America, the richest country on earth, has not squared the account with the brave legions who saved her life and the liberty of the world. We have more gold in this country to-day than all the other nations combined; we have more wealth than all the nations, but we are not permitted to settle with our soldiers. We deny justice to those who saved our country. I suggested that we take some of the debt which the Allies owe us and use it to pay this debt.

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has an amendment to take the interest on that debt and apply it to the settlement of the debt which is due to our soldiers.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. I have an amendment now pending which will take $2,000,000,000 of the bonds that are due us from our allies and apply that sum to a settlement of the soldiers' compensation. I hope the Senator from Alabama will be in a position to vote for that amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I know that the Senator from Tennessee has been the friend of the ex-service men all along, and I know that he has been demanding the collection of this foreign debt—and he is right. I knew the Senator from North Carolina had an amendment proposing to use the interest accrued upon that indebtedness and that he expected to ask that it be used in paying adjusted compensation to the soldiers. I would vote for the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee; I will vote for anything reasonable in order to bring about a fair and just settlement with the boys who served and saved my country.

Mr. President, I suggested that we take $1,000,000,000 out of the principal of what the Allies owe us in addition to the interest, which by now is probably more than $1,200,000,000. One billion dollars of the principal would go a long way toward wiping out this obligation in a cash payment, but I want to go on record now as being in favor of using that interest, when collected, for the purpose of paying this debt. I am not, however, going to stop with that; I am going to put into the amendment, if it is not already in it, that the interest shall be collected; let us not merely say "when collected." I am in favor of prescribing in the amendment that the interest shall be collected, and that when collected it shall be applied upon this debt which we owe to the American soldier. I shall offer an amendment, if necessary, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to proceed to collect the interest.

I protest against the policy that requires the soldiers here to wait while the soldiers of other countries are having their claims adjusted by the Governments that owe us billions of dollars. We can take a little of the principal and the interest now due and settle with our boys. Why not do it? But Republican leaders say that we can not afford to pay our soldiers now.

Why was it that Republican Senators voted to take the bill providing for adjusted compensation off the calendar and send it back to the committee room? They said the Treasury could not stand it.

Let us see what you did to the Treasury after you put to sleep the soldier settlement bill. You lost your consideration for the Treasury very suddenly, for you fell upon it in merciless fashion, and at the instance of the big profiteers you took out and turned over to them in one day $450,000,000. We are asking you to use that money in settling our indebtedness to the soldiers.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my friend from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. I want to suggest to the Senator from Alabama that it would be perfectly feasible to take this bonded indebtedness due to the United States and divide it into such a form that the bonds themselves could be delivered to the soldier, and the country would only be called on to pay the interest until the bonds were discharged in due term.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank the Senator for his valuable contribution to the argument that I am trying to make. The situation here is one of humiliation and resentment. The profiteer gets what he wants. He demands it and obtains it, while the defenders of the Nation must beg and plead and wait. As a Member of the other House I voted to clothe my Government with the power to call these boys to the colors. I voted to put upon them the uniform of my country; to put the flag in their hands and guns upon their shoulders, and to send them to the battle front in France. I backed them with my voice and did all that I could to sustain them on the battle field; I wished for them success, all the while praying in my heart that they would win, as I believed they would. Now, those who were spared the fate of their departed comrades are back home, the saviors of my country, asking at the hands of their Government simply and solely a fair and just settlement, and you will not permit us to give it to them. I said that I voted to send them across the sea, and, so help me God, I am going to vote to do justice to every one of them. I do not intend that any one of the big profiteers shall escape his fair share of the tax burden of the country and get away with it without a solemn protest from me; and I do not intend that Senators on the Republican side who have it in their power to pass this soldier settlement bill to-night shall get away with it without the country knowing just what the real situation is.

We have millions of acres of land; we can dispose of some of that. Surely the idle lands of this country are not more precious in the eyes of the Nation than are the welfare and lives of its soldiers.

But we are told that the soldiers must wait. We did not say that, Mr. President, when the battle fire was raging. When soldiers of the enemy were coming in the distance and our soldiers were marching into danger and death everybody got out of the way for the soldiers then. The big profiteer was not trying to get ahead of the soldier then. He was far removed from danger and making millions of money. But when the war is over and the danger is gone and the curtain has come down upon the stage of the bloodiest maelstrom in all history the soldier must be put in the rear and the profiteer allowed to stand up at the front, bowing and smiling as he is relieved of nearly a half billion of excess-profits tax. Thank God there are a few of us here who still appreciate the soldier. We honor him, while Republican leaders point with pride to the avaricious profiteers, proclaiming with great unction, "These are our jewels." And they are the jewels of the Republican Party.

Mr. President, I love my country and try as best I can to contribute to its strength and its glory. We contribute to the welfare of the country when we point out evils that approach it and dangers that threaten it. Senators, there is an evil spirit in this body to-day, and it is frought with grave danger to the Republic.

I have seen you levy a tax on autotrucks and autowagons, and take $20,000,000 of taxes off of the big holding companies. I have seen you lay a tax upon the little working capital of the average business man; I have seen you lay a tax upon some of the necessities of life, and then I saw you in solemn fashion try to ram down the throat of this country a sales tax that would demand tribute money from every man, woman, and child in the Republic, while you exempted $450,000,000 of taxes to the big profiteers.

I see the American soldier standing yonder in the background. Mr. President, as he smites himself upon his brave breast and lifts his eyes toward the skyland and the stars, he asks himself the question, "Is this the great and free Government for which I fought and offered my life? I fought to save the Republic. For whom have I saved it? Have I saved it for the rank and file of the American people, or have I saved it for the pillage and plunder of dollar aristocracy that remained at home and accumulated millions of dollars?"

Mr. President, the situation here presented brings serious reflections to the thoughtful soldier. That situation, instead of lifting him higher in the scale of being as a broad American filled with the love of his country will tend to make of him a bolshevik, and out of some of them anarchists. Are we going to sit idle and see that done without making solemn protest?

Mr. President, why not say to these big profiteers "You made your millions, your hundreds of millions, and even billions out of the war, and now, in the name of the soldiers of the Republic, we are going to take that $450,000,000 of your excess-profits tax and use it in paying to them adjusted compensation."

Senators, are you afraid that you will offend the big profiteers who contributed to the campaign fund of the Republican Party?

Mr. President, this life that we have is a very precious thing. You took these boys—2,000,000 of them—and sent them across the sea, and I dare say that every one of them as he crossed the ocean infested with submarines, the desperadoes of the deep, had the thought come to him, "I may never come back again," but, Mr. President, nobody heard him even murmur. With a smile upon his face and the light of battle in his eye he went to the front, whipped the enemy, broke the power of the German army, destroyed autocracy, broke up military despotism, and came back with his country's flag covered all over with the glory of his valor. Shall these brave boys now be denied a fair and just settlement at the hands of the Government whose life they saved simply because the big profiteers do not want to part with any of their ill-gotten gain?

Senators on the Republican side have shown that the big profiteers have first claim on this Republican Congress. The man who contributes money to their campaign fund is entitled to more consideration than the soldier who offered his life for his country.

Mr. President, the President of the United States came down and stood there by the Presiding Officer, and in mournful measures told us how pitiful the situation was with the Federal Treasury, and when he went out, the door had not more than closed behind him when a Senator on the other side arose and moved to take that bill off the calendar, and send it back to the committee room, where it has reposed in pitiful silence ever since. Soldiers wrote letters, hundreds and thousands of them, to Members of the House and Senate, asking why it is that they can not have relief. Periodicals friendly to a just settlement with the soldiers filled their columns with pleas to us and to the Government to give them justice; but all these pleas have fallen upon deaf ears, so far as the Republican majority is concerned, and the bill still sleeps in the committee room. Is it right, is it fair, is it just, to treat American soldiers in such a heartless fashion?

What is there about this matter that causes us to make the soldier wait when the profiteer is fed and fattened upon this money that he owes to the Government, and can pay without missing it? It is not going to hurt him at all, Mr. President. You can take this excess-profits tax and apply it on this debt and have it paid, and the average man or woman will not know what is going on. But no! The profiteer says, "I protest; I refuse;" and whenever the profiteer says that to the fellow who holds the purse strings of the campaign fund of the Republican side, he turns pale, big beads of perspiration gather upon his brow, and he folds his tent and before the form of the profiteer he silently steals away.

You do not intend to take this excess-profits tax to pay these soldiers. All right; then let us support the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], or the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR]. Both of them will settle this indebtedness without taxing the American people a dollar.

You know what Edward Markham said, in his poem on "The Man with the Hoe":

> How will it be with kingdoms and with kings
> When whirlwinds of rebellion shall shake the world?

I ask you this day, how will it be with you and your party when you confront these men and a hundred million loyal Americans at the ballot box, and they ask you: "Why did you not permit us to take the interest on the debt due us by the Allies, or use the foreign bonds," as suggested by the Senator from Tennessee, "or take the excess-profits tax," as suggested by the Senator from Missouri, "or give the soldiers some of the public lands, or sell them, to get the money for the soldiers"? There are four or five ways open without taxing the American people one cent, and still you refuse.

To take the place of this excess-profits tax that you have already taken off, you even tried to lay a tax on the poor man's breakfast table, on everything that he consumes, on the swaddling clothes of the infant, and the shroud of the dead. It would tax the burial casket and the tombstone. You are providing to tax everything from the cradle to the grave.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. And the chisel with which the epitaph is graved.

Mr. HEFLIN. Yes, everything; but you took the tax off of dice. I think I know why you did that. You did it so that the thousands of unemployed soldiers could obtain dice and play craps day and night.

You took the tax off of fine furs—oh, these magnificent furs, some of them selling for thousands of dollars—but they are removed from the tax list and many of life's necessities are put upon the tax list, and the soldier must wait!

Mr. President, Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews's poems on The Crosses of the War are very interesting. I want to read just two or three lines of one of them:

> God speed Old Glory when she takes the road to France,
> Through the thundering of the legions, where the bugles play "Advance!"
> God speed! "The fight is mine! Carry you my conquering lance!"
> God speed Old Glory on, God guard Old Glory clean, through battle grime and sweat;
> Consecrate the men who serve her, so that none may e'er forget!

Have we forgotten? Has the enemy forgotten the heroic courage of our boys? Never, as long as any of them live, will they forget these intrepid warriors of the western world, the crusaders of the United States. Never will these soldiers be forgotten by those who looked in their unconquering eyes, felt their bayonets upon the firing line, or stood before their showering shot upon the battle fields of France. No; they will never forget them. Sir Robert Borden, of Canada, said: "They snatched victory from defeat on the western front." Gen. Foch said: "They did not know what fear was. They died with a smile on their faces, fighting for the eternal principles of right." They will never be forgotten over there. The name of the American soldier is honored and revered all over France. It is loved throughout the Old World. How is it in America? Have we so soon forgotten?

Have these men, who did so much for us, been forgotten? Have they passed out of our recollection? Have they gone out of our appreciation? Are they dead at the altar places of our love and gratitude? How about it, Senators?

We have the power. We do not have to wait for another election. We do not have to wait until you get the President. You have the President; you have the Senate; you have the House. You have the power. Why do you not use it? You had better use it quickly, too, because it is going to perish out of your hands just as soon as the people can get an opportunity to pass judgment upon you at the polls.

You know every time that we make arguments to you, you boast that you beat us by 7,000,000 votes. Well, you know what the Bible says about that, do you not?—

> Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall.

You can not stay in power on that 7,000,000 majority that you got last year. Public opinion changes very quickly at times. It has been changing very rapidly in this Government for quite a while. You said you wanted to get away from Democratic rule to Republican normalcy, and now every man, woman, and child in the Republic, except the profiteers, is wanting to get away from Republican normalcy back to Democratic prosperity. The soldier now knows who his friends are. The soldier knows who has never forgotten him.

The soldier knows who kept adjusted compensation sleeping since you went into power March 4, 1919.

Mr. President, If those boys were wealthy and had money that they could subsist upon until the Republican Party in its own way could dole out something to them, it would be different, but we are told that 500,000 of them are out of employment; that many of them are suffering for the necessities of life.

Some of them, we are told, have offered to sell themselves. Just the other day one of them down in the State of Tennessee went up to an officer of the law and said, "I broke open a post office four years ago up in Michigan. What is the punishment?"

"It is a penitentiary offense," the officer replied.

"All right," he said; "here I am."

The officer replied, "The offense is barred by the statute of limitations."

The man replied, "I just thought you would put me in, anyhow."

"No; I can not do it. Why have you come and asked me to put you in prison?"

"Because I knew the Government would feed me and take care of me. I am out of employment and I can not get anything to do."

The profiteer, who sits around in his spacious palace, with all the finery that his gold can buy, who rides in comfort when the cold winds blow, is never exposed to the rain and the sleet and the snow. He has his fortune, which he wrung from the hands of the American Government by selling it at high prices supplies and implements and things of various kinds. He now revels in his wealth, while the boys who bore the brunt of the battle walk the highways of the Republic, ill clad, poorly fed, out of employment, and they are refused a fair settlement with their own Government.

One of the Senators over on the other side last night said that by next July the thing will be arranged. Yes; but how many sad and bitter pangs will pierce the heart of those distressed soldiers before next July? How many pangs of hunger will dart through their ill-treated and neglected stomachs before next July? How many hardships and privations will be endured by them before next July? How many of them may be dead, with the thought last in their mind that their country had forgotten them and had been unjust to them?

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I gladly yield to my friend from Kentucky.

Mr. STANLEY. The Senator is usually accurate. I call his attention to a slight inaccuracy. The Senator over there did not say that it would be attended to next July. He said they would start to attend to it next July.

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my good friend the able and brilliant Senator from Kentucky for his correction. They are going to start to attend to it before next July. The Republican Party has justly earned the title of the postponing party. They always want to postpone anything that is good for the people, but they act with promptness upon all matters that affect the purse-proud profiteer. Oh, yes, Mr. President, he has their ear, and they act promptly when he speaks. Is not this situation enough to fill the American soldier with gloomy forebodings?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield.

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. My recollection is that when the bill was referred back to the Committee on Finance the great chairman, for whom I have the greatest personal respect, assured the Senate that the bill would receive diligent attention. It might be in order now to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania, who is present, what he meant by the word "diligent."

Mr. HEFLIN. What was the expression he used, that they would go about it diligently?

Mr. WATSON of Georgia. Diligently.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Pennsylvania meant to use that word. I think he meant that they would go about this thing with prompt vigilance, which meant that they would kill the legislation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri well said that we are paying all of the other war obligations. What is the first obligation we should pay? Who is there in all the country who will say that any obligation stands above that of our obligation to the soldier? Where is it and what manner and character of obligation is it that transcends that of the Nation's obligation to its defenders? Can there be a greater obligation on this earth than that due to the man who saved your life and saved the life of your Nation, who protected your property and saved your Government? But we come and say that we are paying this obligation and that obligation and the other obligation, but we are not settling the obligation due to the soldier. That, Mr. President, is the paramount and all-important obligation.

Mr. President, when the war was on we were appropriating billions to supply that soldier at the battle front. He was the supreme figure in the drama of that bloody war. All others were back, looking on, as he drove against the German line, facing death every day. He was the supreme figure then, and he was the paramount issue in the hearts of all of us. But now other obligations of a material nature, commercial considerations, the effort looking toward excusing the debt of the Allies—all these loom like mountain peaks above a plain compared to the obligation we owe the soldier. But for his service we would not have any Government to-day.

Mr. President, I would love to see some heroic spirit on the other side rise up and shake his finger in the face of the profiteers and say, "We have had a change of spirit. We have had a change of heart, and we are about to have a change of front. We intend to take back $450,000,000 excess profits, nearly half a billion dollars, and apply it to this obligation. We know that we have sinned against the soldier. We know that we have been guilty of the crime of disloyalty to him, because no man with authority who will permit a soldier to want for food and shelter and raiment, a soldier who served his Nation as ours served this, is loyal to the soldier if he does not help him, because it is his duty, with all the instrumentalities that he has, to use them for the relief of the soldier who is suffering for the necessities of life."

So, Mr. President, I would love to see one rise up over there who would say, "As for me, I am going to be just to the soldier who saved my country; I am going to leave the fleshpots of the profiteers and cast my vote for just compensation for the soldier."

Mr. President, there is a day coming when Republican Senators will be keen of eye and quick of speech. You will not gaze about in listless fashion when the soldier pleads for justice. You will wake up and hear; we are going to make you hear.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Alabama yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am glad to yield to my good friend.

Mr. STANLEY. Our blessed Lord once found some people asleep when they ought to have been awake, and He said, "Sleep on."

Mr. HEFLIN. I thank my good friend for quoting that Scripture. If there is anything on this earth that confounds a stand pat Republican Senator it is Scripture, and I am glad to have it injected into my speech.

Now, Mr. President, I have detained the Senate longer than I intended to. I intended to take only a few moments upon this all-important question. I say to you before I take my seat that mistreatment of the boys who bade farewell to home and loved ones and offered their lives for us is inexcusable and indefensible.

I wish to close with this quotation from the Scripture. I am reminded of another time, since my friend from Kentucky has quoted Scripture, when the greatest peace advocate who ever walked the earth trod the dusty highways of Judea. Preaching the gospel of democracy unto the least of these, my brethren, He said, "I was naked and ye clothed me. I was hungry and ye gave me to eat. Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these ye did it unto me."

Shall the soldiers of the Republic say that "You took me out of my employment. I had a good job. I was making a little money. I was happy in the peaceful pursuits of life here at home. I went to the fields of France and was gone months and months and kept out of my employment until the war was over. I came back and my job was gone. I have walked the streets and I can not find work to do. I am hungry and ill-clad."

Hungry, and ye gave me not to eat. Naked, and ye clothed me not. God forbid that such an indictment shall stand against the Government they served and saved in the hour of its peril.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. HEFLIN. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. LENROOT. I would like to ask the Senator if the amendment he is now supporting is adopted, how soon after it becomes the law could any soldier receive a single dollar under it?

Mr. HEFLIN. I would provide that this money should be paid to them as fast as it is collected.

Mr. LENROOT. But I am asking about the situation under the amendment which the Senator is supporting. What does it provide?

Mr. HEFLIN. It provides for taking this excess-profits tax.

Mr. LENROOT. When will any soldier be entitled to receive any money under the amendment that is now pending if it shall be enacted into law?

Mr. REED. Just as soon as there is enough paid in from the excess profits to make the first payment to any class under the soldiers' bonus proposition.

Mr. LENROOT. Can any soldier receive any money before July 1, 1922?

Mr. REED. I do not think so.

Mr. LENROOT. No.

Mr. REED. No.

Mr. LENROOT. That is the point I desired to bring out.

Mr. REED. But he will be a long time waiting for it at the rate the Senator's party has been appropriating money.

Mr. NEW obtained the floor.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. President, may I say this to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. NEW. I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. HEFLIN. The fact that the public would know that these soldiers would have disbursed to them $450,000,000 would enable everyone of them to go to a bank and borrow money to live on through this winter, because the minute the Government goes on record as saying that it is committed to this thing they would have no trouble about getting the money needed. That is my answer to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. STANLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. STANLEY. I did not know the Senator had been recognized.

Mr. NEW. I shall be through in just a moment.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] just said it will be a long time before the soldiers realize anything at the rate we are appropriating money. It will also be a long time if they have to wait for the long-distance orators in this body to get through talking.

Mr. President, a week ago this afternoon, while listening to the Senator from Missouri present his discussion of the amendment which he has offered, it occurred to me that the amendment was unconstitutional because, as I saw it, it levied a tax upon one set of people and devoted it directly to the benefit of another class of people.

I have taken the precaution since to consult attorneys with reference to the matter. I have here an opinion obtained from a source in which I place very great reliance, and I ask unanimous consent that that opinion may be printed in the RECORD in the type used in the report of the debates.

Mr. REED. By whom is the opinion rendered?

Mr. NEW. That I do not care to say.

Mr. REED. I object to the opinion going in the RECORD unless the author's name is given.

Mr. NEW. Then I will adopt it as my own. If the Senator from Missouri will permit its presentation and printing in the RECORD, I shall yield the floor in order that he may proceed, as he has to occupy the rest of the time that is left to us between now and midnight. If not, I shall read it in my own time. It is just as the Senator from Missouri prefers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks to have the opinion printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. REED. Ordinarily I would not object to any document being printed in the RECORD that comes authenticated, but an opinion of a man who is afraid to sign his name is certainly an opinion entitled to no consideration.

Mr. NEW. Oh, the man is not afraid to sign his name. I have said that I assume the responsibility for it.

Mr. REED. Why does not the Senator give his name?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri object to the request of the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. REED. I am not going to object if the Senator wishes to stand sponsor for the opinion.

Mr. NEW. I assume the responsibility for it.

Mr. REED. If he wishes to stand sponsor for an opinion that nobody else fathers, and yet does not give it as his own opinion, I shall not object even though the opinion be a mile long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the opinion will be printed in the RECORD as requested.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

IN RE AMENDMENT PROPOSED BY SENATOR REED TO THE REVENUE BILL.

The amendment proposed by Senator REED to the pending revenue measure provides in substance that upon the net income of every corporation there shall be levied the following taxes: (a) Twenty per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of the excess-profits credit (determined under sec. 312 of the bill and not in excess of 20 per cent of the invested capital; (b) 40 per cent of the amount of the net income in excess of 20 per cent of the invesfed capital. The moneys derived from such taxes are to constitute a separate fund and are to be devoted to the payment of a "bonus" to veterans of the World War.

The "bonus" so to be paid will amount to the following sums: For each day of active service in excess of 60 days in the military or naval forces of the United States $1.25 for service, but the total amount payable to any veteran who performed no overseas service shall not exceed $500, and the amount payable to any veteran who performed overseas service shall not exceed $625. No part of the fund is to be paid to any commissioned officer above the grade of captain in the Army or Marine Corps or a lieutenant in the Navy.

The power of Congress to levy a tax on the earnings of corporations is clear, and the only question to be determined in this instance is whether the tax provided is rendered illegal by reason of the purpose for which it is to be levied.

A natural limitation upon the taxing power is that all taxes shall be levied for public purposes. Perhaps it is more accurate to say that taxes may be assessed and collected only for purposes which will result directly or indirectly to the benefit of the taxpayer. It is upon the latter ground that the Supreme Court has denied to States the right to tax property outside of their territorial jurisdiction.

Thus in Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Kentucky (199 U. S., 194, 202) the Supreme Court, in holding that the State of Kentucky had no power to tax property having no situs in that State, said:

> The power of taxation, indispensable to the existence of every civilized government, is exercised upon the assumption of an equivalent rendered to the taxpayer in the protection of his person and property, in adding to the value of such property, or in the creation and maintenance of public conveniences in which he shares. * * *

Getting down to the precise constitutional objection to the proposed amendment, I think it must be rested on the due process clause of the fifth amendment of the Constitution—

> No person shall * * * be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law.

Analogous provisions of State statutes have been declared void under the "due process" clause of the fourteenth amendment, which, as you know, is coextensive with the like clause of the fifth amendment. The reason for this is that such statutes take the property of a citizen without his consent for the private use of others. It is well settled that a State can not, under the form of taxation, take the property of its citizens and give it to build up the private fortunes of others.

The case of Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Nebraska (164 U. S. 403), involved a statute of the State of Nebraska which required the Missouri Pacific Railway Co. to permit an association of private individuals to erect a grain elevator on its land. The Supreme Court held the statute to be invalid under the fourteenth amendment, saying (p. 417):

> The taking by a State of the private property of one person or corporation, without the owner's consent, for the private use of another is not due process of law. * * *

The leading case on this subject is that of Citizens Savings & Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall., 655). That case involved the validity of an act of the Kansas Legislature, authorizing cities and townships "to encourage the establishment of manufactories and such other enterprises as may tend to improve and develop such city either by direct appropriation from the general fund or by the issuance of bonds of such city in such amounts as the council may determine." The whole opinion bears so clearly upon the point that if it were not for its great length it might be profitably set out herein. In pointing out the ground of objection to the act the court used the following simple illustrations (p. 663):

> There are limitations on such power which grow out of the essential nature of all free governments—implied reservations of individual rights, without which the social compact could not exist, and which are respected by all governments entitled to the name. No court, for instance, would hesitate to declare void a statute which enacted that A and B who were husband and wife to each other should be so no longer, but that A should thereafter be the husband of C and B the wife of D, or which should enact that the homestead now owned by A should no longer be his but should henceforth be the property of B.

The court further said (p. 664):

> * * * This power can as readily be employed against one class of individuals and in favor of another, so as to ruin the one class and give unlimited wealth and prosperity to the other, if there is no implied limitation of the uses for which the power may be exercised.
> To lay with one hand the power of the Government on the property of the citizen, and with the other to bestow it upon favored individuals, to aid private enterprises and build up private fortunes, is none the less a robbery because it is done under the forms of law and is called taxation.

And the court concluded as follows (p. 664):

> We have established, we think, beyond cavil that there can be no lawful tax which is not laid for a public purpose.

This principle has been applied by the courts in numerous cases: Parkersburg v. Brown, 106 U. S., 487, 491 (bonds to manufacturers); Cole v. La Grange, 113 U. S., 1, 9 (bonds to aid manufacturers); Dodge v. Mission Tp., 107 Fed., 827, 832 (bonds to aid manufacturers); Allen v. Inhabitants, 60 Me., 124 (bonds to aid manufacturers); Coates v. Campbell, 37 Minn., 498 (bonds to aid manufacturers); Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass., 454 (bonds to aid sufferers from Boston fire); Patty v. Colgan, 97 Cal., 251 (aid to flood sufferers); Lucas County v. State, 75 Ohio St., 114, 135 (annuities for the blind); Wisconsin Keeley Institute Co. v. Milwaukee Co., 95 Wis., 153 (bounty to private inebriate hospital); State v. Froehlich, 118 Wis., 129 (bounty to private inebriate hospital); State v. Switzler, 143 Mo., 287 (bounty to students attending State university); Kingman v. City of Brockton, 153 Mass., 255 (aid in erection of building for Grand Army post); State v. Osawkee Tp., 14 Kans., 418 (furnishing seed grain to farmers); Deering & Co. v. Peterson, 75 Minn., 118 (appropriation to purchase seed grain for those without crops); Deal v. Mississippi County, 107 Mo., 464 (bounties to growers of trees); Missouri Pacific Railway Co. v. Nebraska, 164 U. S., 403 (taking of railway right of way for private elevator); Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co. v. Campbell, 61 Kans., 439 (free tickets to stock shippers); Harp v. Choctaw, Oklahoma & Gulf Railway Co., 118 Fed., 169 (compelling building of spur track to coal mine); Oxnard Beet Sugar Co. v. State of Nebraska, 73 Nebr., 57 (bounty to growers of sugar beets); Michigan Sugar Co. v. Dox, 124 Mich., 674 (bounty for growers of sugar beets); Minnesota Sugar Co. v. Iverson, 91 Minn., 30 (bounty for growers of sugar beets).

The principle that the private property of one can not be taken to enrich another being clear, it remains to consider whether after all Senator REED'S amendment may be said to fall within the principle. There is no authority directly in point, and in matters of this kind the law is a very inexact science. The granting of bounties to encourage enlistment is a procedure well established in the law, and State and muinicipal bounty acts have been upheld, although the States and municipalities were not themselves directly charged with providing for the national defense. In like manner pension laws have never been questioned, because it has always been conceded that the State and Nation have owed a moral if not a legal duty to those who have suffered disability in military service.

Again, Congress has, as I recall, appropriated money at different times for the alleviation of suffering in great disasters; and while I have not verified this, I think it has appropriated money for the victims of earthquakes and famine in foreign countries.

Of course, appropriations of the class last mentioned are very different from special levies on a particular class for the benefit of another class. If for no other reason, they differ in that the appropriation is made out of the general funds of the Treasury, and it is at least doubtful whether any particular taxpayer would have any standing on which to contest the appropriation. But in the present case it is proposed to levy a special tax upon a particular class, and, of course, any member of that class would be in a position to contest and litigate the assessment.

Looking to the merits of Senator REED'S amendment, it is perfectly clear that no legal obligation rests upon the United States to grant to veterans a gratuity of the character mentioned. Whether or not there is any moral obligation to grant to veterans a bonus based wholly on services rendered, without regard to the present needs or circumstances of the individual veteran, is a debatable question. Assuming that the payment of such a bonus would be justified if paid out of the general funds of the Treasury, it is extremely doubtful whether it would be legal to impose a special tax upon a particular class for that purpose.

State courts have made a distinction between "bounties" to encourage enlistment and so-called "bonuses" for services already rendered, holding the latter to come within the rule against the taking of property without due process of law. Thus the Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts, in the opinion of the justices, One hundred and eighty-sixth Massachusetts, page 603, held that a statute of Massachusetts attempting to give to veterans of the Civil War a bonus for past services was unconstitutional. The justices said:

> It is a familiar rule of law that under the constitution of the Commonwealth money can be raised by taxation only for public purposes. This rule has been stated and explained in many judicial opinions. (See Lowell v. Boston, 111 Mass., 454, and cases hereinafter cited.) Whether the use of money under the provisions of a particular statute is for a public purpose or merely for the benefit of individuals is sometimes a question difficult to answer, although usually it is easy of determination. In the present case if the only object of the statute is to give gratuities to individuals of a certain class, without any benefit to the general public, the statute is unconstitutional.
> In Mead v. Acton (139 Mass., 341), a case which arose in regular judicial proceedings and was argued by counsel, questions were decided by our predecessors which are identical in principle with those now before us. The statute of 1882, chapter 93, purported to authorize the town of Acton to raise money by taxation to pay a bounty of $125 each to certain soldiers who had reenlisted in the Twenty-sixth Regiment of Massachusetts Volunteers, to the credit of the town, and who never had received any bounty for such reenlistment. The court held the statute unconstitutional, saying in the opinion, among other things:
> "In the case at bar it seems to us clear that the object for which the town of Acton has raised this money is private and not public. The town has made no promise to these soldiers and is not under any obligation to pay them any bounties. The purpose is not to repay any sums advanced them as an inducement to enlist. * * * The war has been over for many years, and the payment of these bounties can not encourage enlistments or in any way affect the public service or promote the public welfare. The direct primary object is to benefit individuals and not the public."
>
> This case was approved and reaffirmed by the court in Kingman v. Brockton (153 Mass., 255). In the opinion of the justices (175 Mass., 599), although a question was raised about some of the language of the court in Mead v. Acton, the case was assumed to have been correctly decided. In the opinion last mentioned this language was used:
> "The ground of decision in Mead v. Acton (139 Mass., 341), which certainly went very far, was not a distinction between the direct and indirect action of the legislature, but was that because the war had been over so long it was manifest that the public welfare could not be promoted by the payment of the proposed bounties, and therefore a statute attempting to divert public funds to private uses, and was void. Possibly other reasons could have been invoked."

It is plain that there is no difference in principle between a statute purporting to autherize a town to raise money by taxation to pay bounties to soldiers who served on its quota in the Civil War and a statute purporting to authorize the State to perform an act of the same kind. We can not sustain the present statute without departing from the law of the decision in Mead v. Acton and disregarding a precedent which hitherto has been held to be correct.

But in this opinion we need not consider the subject of pensions to soldiers, for the statute does not purport to grant pensions or rewards for meritorious service, or money for the relief of present necessities. It purports to give bounties now only to those who did not receive them at the time of enlistment, which, if given them, would have been given as inducements to enlist in the service of the United States. Under the provisions of this statute those who enlisted without a bounty, under other influences or upon other inducements, would receive now as a gratuity this sum of money representing an additional inducement. The object of the act, as disclosed by its provisions, is not to give rewards in recognition of valuable services, and thus to promote loyalty and patriotism, but to equalize bounties given to induce enlistments in a particular military service many years ago.

To the same effect is Kidder against Selectmen of Stewartstown (48 N. H., 290).

The Court of Appeals of the State of New York recently has held unconstitutional a bonus law of that State, but our library has not yet received a copy of the opinion. I am under the impression, however, that the decision was based upon the very specific provision of the State constitution against appropriating public funds for private uses.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, a so-called bonus amendment, which I ask that the Secretary may read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Tennessee state whether or not his amendment is an amendment to that of the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; it is to be offered in the event that fails.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am merely asking that the amendment which I send to the desk be now read for the information of the Senate. I shall offer it at the proper time.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I think under the unanimous-consent agreement that can not be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Why not?

Mr. CURTIS. The unanimous-consent agreement provides that all the time to-day shall be devoted to two classes of amendments, up to 3 o'clock to the amendments offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] and from 3 o'clock until 12 o'clock to-night to the so-called bonus amendments.

Mr. McKELLAR. This is a bonus amendment that I ask to have read under the rule.

Mr. CURTIS. Of course, if it is a bonus amendment there is no objection to having it read.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is a bonus amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the proposed amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 7, after line 7, insert the following:

> (c) That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, directed, and instructed at the earliest practicable moment to secure from the several foreign Governments, namely, Belgium, Cuba, Czechoslovakia, France, Great Britain, Greece, Italy, Liberia, Rumania, Russia, and Serbia, to which Governments moneys were loaned by the United States, under and by virtue of several war emergency acts of Congress passed in the years 1917 and 1918, long-time interest-bearing bonds of such Governments as provided in said acts, the interest on such bonds to be paid by said Governments semiannually at rates not less than those fixed in said acts.
> That in making settlements with the several foreign Governments aforesaid the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to take interest-bearing bonds for the past-due interest on said loans and the future interest up to January 1, 1922, such bonds to be of like tenor and effect as the bonds for the principal loaned to said Governments, and the interest thereon to be paid semiannually in like manner.
> That the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure from such foreign Governments as may be indebted to the United States bonds of like tenor and effect and of like rates of interest and payable in like manner for the following indebtedness: (1) Obligations received from the Secretary of War and from the Secretary of the Navy on account of the sale of surplus war material; (2) obligations held by the United States Grain Corporation; (3) obligations received by the Treasurer from the American relief administration; (4) obligations due the United States on any other account from such foreign nations.
> The Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed to secure bonds, of like tenor and effect and like rates of interest, for the indebtedness due the United States from the following nations: Armenia, Austria, Esthonia, Finland, Hungary, Latvia, Lithuania, and Poland.
>
> That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to accept, in addition to said bonds, any securities from such foreign Governments as collateral and as a guaranty of the prompt payment of said bonds and interest thereon.
> That of said bonds the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart $2,000,000,000 in amount thereof to be used in the payment of a bonus to the soldiers of the late war with Germany, under such conditions as the Congress may hereafter direct.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, several days ago I discussed the general question of the collection of the interest on the allied indebtedness. As we all know the indebtedness itself is not in the form of bonds as provided in the acts of 1917 and 1918, under which the loans were made, but that indebtedness due from our allies is simply in the form of I O U's. It has never been put in the form of bonds, as directed by the statute. The first provision of the amendment which I have offered, therefore, gives the Secretary of the Treasury full authority to take bonds for all the indebtedness, principal and interest, owed by our allies and by other European Governments to us, and all under the terms of the acts of 1917 and 1918. Then it provides that we are to begin to collect the interest on January 1, 1922. The last clause of the amendment proposes to set aside $2,000,000,000 of those bonds to be used by the Congress to the extent of the amount set aside as a fund out of which to pay such compensation as may be awarded to soldiers. I believe that this is the best possible way of paying to the soldiers that compensation which it seems to me practically every Senator in this body thinks should be paid. It adds no additional tax burden upon the American people. It simply uses an asset of the Government for this most worthy cause.

There are several plans that have been offered for the settlement of this indebtedness. Before we come to vote I am going to discuss very briefly, merely outlining them, the four plans which have been proposed.

The first plan is that offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. His amendment provides for soldiers' compensation and that the money shall be derived from the reimposition of the excess-profits tax; in other words, he proposes to keep the excess-profits tax in force for the purpose of paying the soldiers this bonus. It has been estimated by the Finance Committee that a reasonable bonus will cost not less than one and a half billion dollars.

Under the amendment of the Senator from Missouri it would take four or five years—certainly four years and perhaps five years—to pay the bonus that may be adjudged to be due the soldiers. I have my doubts at this time whether that would be a wise plan. The Senate has voted overwhelmingly to repeal the excess-profits tax in the future. If the excess-profits tax may be justified, it can be justified better as a means of providing for the payment of the soldiers' bonus than on any other ground. That plan will work in a number of years; it may be the best plan; and I am not sure but I will vote for it. However, I do not believe it is so good a plan as the one which I have offered.

The next plan which has been suggested is the plan of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. His plan merely proposes to appropriate for the purpose of meeting the bonus the interest on the Allies' debt. By the way, that interest has not yet been put in the form of coupons, and as I understand the Senator's amendment it does not provide that that shall be done. No adjustment with our allies is provided, but the amendment does provide that the interest on the debt—amounting to between four hundred and five hundred million dollars; probably nearer $500,000,000—shall be applied to the payment of the soldiers' bonus. That plan will require three or four years—not less than four years—to pay the bonus. That plan has merit, and I do not know but I may vote for it if we can not get a better plan.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. Both the amendment of the Senator from Missouri and the amendment proposed by myself adopt as the basis of the plan of compensation the soldiers' bonus bill as introduced by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] and as agreed to in the committee.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand that.

Mr. SIMMONS. And that plan provides for a cash payment. It has several optional plans, but there is one plan for a cash payment. It was the estimate of the Senator from North Dakota in presenting the bill that the annual payment under the cash plan would not very much exceed, as I remember, $200,000,000, and certainly the annual interest from bonds representing the indebtedness of the Allies to us would amount to more than $200,000,000. Under the cash bonus plan, of course, if it was all to be paid out at one time, that annual payment would not be sufficient; but the bonus is proposed to be paid out in annual installments.

Mr. McKELLAR. I so understand.

Mr. SIMMONS. And my amendment is intended to apply to that plan.

Mr. McKELLAR. I understand, and that plan also has merit. While I do not think it is so good as the plan which I propose, if the Senator's plan can be adopted, I not only should have no objection to it but I should vote for it, because I think it is preferable to the Reed plan, for it does not propose to tax any part of the American people in order to meet the expense. It merely requires that when our allies shall pay the interest on their debt to us the amount so paid shall be applied to this purpose.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course, I do not want to get into an argument with the Senator from Tennessee about this proposition, but I call his attention to the fact that every loan made to foreign Governments by us was made out of the proceeds of the sale of bonds which our Government issued and sold to the American people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, yes; I understand that.

Mr. REED. And we must levy taxes in order to pay those bonds and pay the interest upon them.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; I understand that.

Mr. REED. The result is, therefore, that the only difference in that respect between the Senator's plan and my own is that he proposes to take the interest which the foreign Governments pay our Government on loans which we made to them out of the proceeds of American bonds and then continue to levy a tax to pay the interest upon the American securities we issued in order to obtain that money, and to levy the tax direct in each case. So the American people must ultimately pay the compensation whatever it may be.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not agree entirely with the Senator's statement. As I understand his plan, in effect he keeps the excess-profits tax which will be discontinued under the pending bill. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri merely reenacts the provisions of law providing for that tax in order to pay the bonus. Of course, that is a tax upon a part of the American people. The plan which the Senator from North Carolina has put forward and the plan which I have put forward do not tax any part of the American people, but it requires bonds to be secured from our allies and the future interest to be paid on the bonds by them. That, I think, is a fair statement of the differences between the three plans.

Mr. REED. But, if the Senator please, the plan that he proposes does tax the American people. If Europe owes us $10,000,000,000, as she does, we borrowed ten billions to loan to Europe and took her securities and Europe pays us the interest, which the law at the time contemplated she should, we would take that interest and pay the interest on the bonds that we owe the American people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, Mr. President, I understand that.

Mr. REED. If we divert that fund to some other purpose, then we will be obliged to continue to levy taxes to pay the interest on our own bonds, and if we take the interest that should be used to replace the interest on our own bonds, we will have to get it by taxes from the American people.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, I understand that.

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think anyone would understand that, but the fact is that we are not now collecting the interest on the debt due us.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. If the Senator will permit me to proceed for a few moments, I understand perfectly well the point that he makes, and I am not going to take issue with him; for the purpose of this argument he may consider that I agree with him; but I desire in the very short time that I expect to occupy the floor to put forth, if I may, the merits of the other plan. That brings me down to the plan which has been proposed by me.

We have due us this foreign indebtedness of $11,000,000,000; it is not drawing any interest; we do not even have bonds for it, as the law directed that we should have. The amendment offered by me directs the Secretary of the Treasury to take bonds for that indebtedness under the acts of 1917 and 1918, and after January 1 to begin collecting the interest. That will not impose a hardship on anyone. We have collected substantially no interest in the last four or five years, during which time our allies have had the money. We loaned them the money without stint; we loaned them the money at par; we loaned it to them at a low rate of interest, at the same rate of interest at which we borrowed it from our own people in order to loan it to them. We have not been hard on them; we have been exceedingly lenient with them. Everybody realizes, I believe the nations concerned themselves now realize, that it is their duty to begin to pay the interest on their debt to us. I would not be hard on any of them. Quite the contrary. I am sure none of them would say we have been hard on them about this indebtedness.

Why can we not, as the first step, collect the interest, and then, first and above all, from the amount so collected pay the debt which by every moral obligation on earth we owe to our soldiers? It would be the best possible way of adjusting that obligation and paying our soldiers merely to set aside not the whole amount but $2,000,000,000 of it only.

The bonds to be issued under the plan suggested would be indorsed by the United States Government; they would be the best bonds ever issued; the soldiers would be delighted to accept them. They would be immediately convertible in cash. It is a better plan than the one proposed by the McCumber bill, although that plan embodied many excellent features, and I would have voted for it; but this will be a better plan, because it will give the soldiers bonds that will be worth par and which will be the best bonds in the world. British bonds, for instance, or French bonds, indorsed by the United States Government will sell at par anywhere in the world. I know of no better way to utilize a portion, two-elevenths only, of the entire indebtedness than by distributing it amongst the soldiers in compensation for the incalculable services they rendered their country.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not had the pleasure as yet of examining the plan of the Senator from Tennessee. Do I understand the Senator from Tennessee as stating his plan to be that the Government is to take $2,000,000,000 of bonds and cut them up into denominations and parcel them out amongst the soldiers, according to the amount of compensation due to them? Is that the idea?

Mr. McKELLAR. All that the amendment does is to provide for taking bonds from our allies, in the first place, settling all of the differences between us, all the debts that they owe us of every kind, nature, and description.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that.

Mr. McKELLAR. Then the amendment directs the Secretary of the Treasury exactly what to do and how to go about it and to proceed under the acts of 1917 and 1918, under which the money was loaned to our allies. Having done that, it provides as follows:

That of said bonds—

That is, of the $11,000,000,000 of bonds that we will get, and a little more than that, perhaps—

That of said bonds the Secretary of the Treasury shall set apart $2,000,000,000 in amount thereof to be used in the payment of a bonus to the soldiers of the late war with Germany, under such conditions as the Congress may hereafter direct.

I take it that if this amendment shall be adopted and the Secretary of the Treasury shall do as he is required to do by the amendment, the chairman of the Finance Committee will report out a bill which shall provide how the bonds shall be set aside, how they shall be indorsed, what bonds shall be taken, what their denomination will be, and upon what terms they shall be given the soldiers; in other words, it is contemplated that a soldiers' bonus bill shall be hereafter reported and passed by the Congress, and the amendment itself merely provides how $2,000,000,000 shall be raised with which to pay the bonus or adjusted compensation, it having been ascertained that that will be an ample sum.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, the information I desired from the Senator was whether it was his thought that the interest upon these $2,000,000,000 bonds should be paid over to the soldiers in settlement of their bonus claim or whether it was his thought that the Government, holding such bonds, would issue its own bonds in smaller denominations to the amount of $2,000,000,000 and turn those bonds over to the soldiers.

Mr. McKELLAR. It could be done in either way, but my own thought was that these bonds should be indorsed by the United States Government and then turned over to the soldiers in proper denominations. The effect of it would be that those bonds would sell on the market at par or more. Many of these soldiers would sell them. The bond buyers of the United States or of other countries would buy them from the soldiers just like any other issue of bonds is bought and sold on the market.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, the Government would take these bonds in small denominations from the foreign countries and then parcel them out among the soldiers according to their claims?

Mr. McKELLAR. Absolutely. There is no reason in the world why that should not be done.

Mr. REED. And the Government of the United States would guarantee them.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Government ought to guarantee them. I see no reason why it should not guarantee them. I believe that the bonds that would be taken under this amendment would be very excellent bonds, but when indorsed by the United States Government they would certainly sell for not less than par. We know that the United States bonds are now about back to par, and I have no doubt that certainly the British, French, and Italian bonds, and the Belgian bonds, and perhaps all of the issues, with the possible exception of Russia, would sell for par.

Mr. President, I am not going into this matter further. The amendment is a very simple one. It is a very simple question. It is just whether or not the Senate wants to give a portion, two-elevenths, of this indebtedness to the American soldiers. You hear a lot of talk about giving all the English indebtedness to England. You hear a great deal of talk about canceling the debt of France, or of Italy, or of the other countries. I believe a resolution could be easily passed here, if not much was said about it, to cancel this debt entirely, and give it to our allies; but when you talk about giving two-elevenths of it to our own soldiers, almost every Senator is up in arms. The other day I could not get a sufficient show of hands for a roll call on the amendment. They voted it down almost before I had an opportunity to explain it; and it does seem to me that before we undertake to cancel these bonds, in part or in whole, we had better use a portion of them to give a well-merited bonus to the soldiers of this country. We owe it to them. We are the only country that has not given its soldiers a bonus. We can give it without taxing our own people. We can help our country while helping our own soldiers. If we don't do it this way, the time will come when we will have to tax our own people to do it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope the Senator did not understand me as expressing any opposition toward his plan.

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not believe the Senator from North Carolina would.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; on the contrary, I think it a very good plan.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am greatly obliged to the Senator for his indorsement of it. I have felt so.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not wish to discriminate between these three plans. I think most of them will work and work very well.

Mr. McKELLAR. Possibly they will, and I will say to the Senator in perfect frankness that my interest in giving this compensation to the soldier is so great that while I think my plan is best—it is the simplest, it is the most easily consummated, it will cost the American people least, it will be the most effective, it can be done quicker than any other, and the whole matter could be settled and taken out of politics in that way quicker than in any other way—while I think that the plan I have put forward is the best, in order that the soldiers may get what is their due I would be perfectly willing to vote for the Senator's plan. I believe I would almost go to the extent of voting for the plan of the Senator from Missouri, although I do not believe that is anything like so good as the plan that has been suggested by the Senator from North Carolina and that which has been suggested by me, and I would not like to take that course.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do want to suggest to the Senator from Tennessee, if he will permit me to interrupt him for that purpose, that it seems to me that instead of dividing up the $2,000,000,000 of foreign bonds and parceling them out among the soldiers, giving some soldiers, perhaps, the bonds of one country and others the bonds of another country, it would be a great deal better if those $2,000,000,000 of bonds were placed in the Treasury, remained the property of the United States, and the United States issued against those bonds its own bonds in such denominations as may be convenient for the purpose, thereby giving to each soldier a bond of his own country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am not so sure but that that would be an excellent plan. I have not gone into it; but that is a matter for future legislation if this amendment is adopted. There is no reason why that plan could not be put forward after the adoption of my amendment.

Just one other matter and I am through.

I see it suggested in the morning paper that our friends on the other side of the aisle propose that some time next summer they will begin to take steps to give the soldiers a bonus, and the way they are going to do it is to adopt the manufacturers' tax and apply that tax to the payment of the bonus. I do not think that plan is as good as even the plan presented by the Senator from Missouri. My reason for it is this:

A manufacturers' tax means a consumers' tax; and if that sort of a tax is adopted with which to pay the bonus you are virtually taking the money out of one pocket of the soldier and putting it in the other pocket of the soldier. In other words, the soldiers are almost entirely of the consuming class, and the consuming class will pay that sort of a tax. The soldiers are not the ones that have the wealth of the country; and if you are going just to pass a consumers' tax with which to pay the bonus, I do not know whether it will be very much of a payment or not. The soldiers themselves will pay the greater part of the bonus if that sort of a plan is adopted. I am not in favor of that plan. I hope that our Republican friends will not carry it out. I hope it is merely rumor. I hope they do not intend to impose such a tax as that for the purpose of paying our soldiers. In effect it certainly would not be more than half compensation, because under such a tax, as we all know, the consumers paying it, the soldiers would pay a very large portion of the very tax that had been levied in their behalf.

Mr. President, I think that is all I want to say about this matter. I have tried to explain just what my amendment is. The question is simple. It is easily understandable. If the Senate desires to contribute not more than $2,000,000,000 out of the $11,000,000,000 of these bonds to the American soldiers, they can vote for the amendment. If you do not want to do it, if you still feel that you ought to cancel these debts—and that seems to be the sentiment here in the Senate, especially on the other side of the aisle, judging from the way they voted the other night—if you still want to do that, you can vote against this amendment. I believe, however, that it is the best plan. That is very natural. Having produced the plan, it is very natural that I should have some pride of authorship in it; but, so far as I am able to determine, it is the best possible plan with which to pay this soldiers' bonus. It will not fall upon the taxpayers of this country. It will not be an additional tax upon them. It will cause these foreign countries, who honestly owe it, to pay us. They owe more to these soldiers than they do to any other people in the world. It would be very proper, as it seems to me, that a portion of this indebtedness should be paid to the soldiers who saved these other countries.

There is another proposition about this that is more or less selfish—I mean, nationally selfish. If this Congress ever gives $2,000,000,000 or any distinct portion of this indebtedness to the soldiers of this country, we will never have a particle of trouble about collecting the interest as and when it falls due, and the principal when it becomes due, because I know that no nation that now exists that has received these benefits will for a moment refuse to pay the interest on the bonds to these soldiers who aided so splendidly in saving those nations from defeat and ruination. It would be an easier matter to reach a just and a fair settlement with our own allies if they know that so large a portion of this indebtedness is to go to pay the compensation that we owe to the soldiers.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator this question: Assuming that the Senator's plan should be adopted and carried out to the extent that the bonds of the foreign Governments would come into the hands of our soldiers and be owned by those to whom they should go, does the Senator provide as against their assignment? Would they be assignable, and thus, perhaps, pass into the hands of others?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course they would be assignable, and would pass into the hands of others, and I have no doubt that many of them would soon pass into the hands of others, because many of the soldiers would want to dispose of them. Many of them would necessarily have to sell them. We understand the figures to be that about 500,000 of the soldiers are without employment now; and, naturally, a man without employment with a bond in his pocket will be very likely to dispose of it, especially if it is worth dollar for dollar.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely. Therefore, assuming what the Senator says to be true—and it may well be so—if the bonds do pass into the hands of others, then, of course, there would not be the inducement on the part of foreign Governments to pay the interest.

Mr. McKELLAR. To a limited extent the Senator's contention is correct, but, of course, all of these soldiers are not going to dispose of their bonds.

Mr. President, there is just one other thought and I am through. I have taken very much longer than I expected and longer than I should have taken.

I notice a great propaganda going on about canceling the bonds, on the theory that Great Britain and France are not able to pay even the interest. I saw in a British newspaper not long ago that argument made. Does not that sound rather remarkable in view of the fact that Great Britain and France are insisting that Germany should pay upward of $30,000,000,000 in Germany's present defeated condition?

Surely, if Great Britain and France—and they have so attested by their public authorities—say that Germany in defeat is able to pay $30,000,000,000 to those two countries, Great Britain and France in victory, having received enormous sums in reparation, having received as a result of the war property that is estimated to be of the value of $50,000,000,000 going to Great Britain and $25,000,000,000 going to France, are able to pay the small amount of interest on the bonds that they should have given us four or five years ago.

I take it that that propaganda is not put out by either the French or the British Government. I do not believe that either one of those Governments has any sympathy with the idea that these debts ought to be canceled. I think that is confined largely to a maudlin sentiment in this country, a sentiment that is not based on a real understanding of the situation. I say that it is immensely more important that we should take these bonds and collect this interest and turn them over to the necessities of our soldiers who protected these Governments from whom the bonds and the interest will come than to create or attempt to creat, directly or indirectly, a maudlin sentimentality for the cancellation of the bonds.

"Oh, America is so rich and powerful that she can afford to cancel a little sum like $11,000,000,000, and see what effect it will have upon the world." I have no sympathy with any such idea. I not only want to be considerate of our debtors, but I think we ought to go to the last limit in generosity, and I think we have gone to the last limit in accommodating them. We lent them this money, it will be remembered, at par when their own bonds would bring hardly half that much. We did not haggle with them. We did not borrow the money at one rate of interest from our own people and lend it to them at a higher rate of interest.

We lent it to them at par, and much of that money came from the hard earnings of the working men and women of this country. They saved; they skimped; they denied themselves and their children; they did everything in their power to pay for the bonds on credit that they bought from our own Government; and they got only a small interest for it. Now, unless something is done to take bonds for this indebtedness and to collect the interest on this indebtedness we are violating our solemn pledges to the people from whom we borrowed this money.

Someone said on the floor of the Senate that the thing for us to do was just to turn the matter over to the Secretary of the Treasury and let him make "the best trade possible." Let us for a moment consider how unfair and unjust it would be to turn it over to the Secretary of the Treasury for him to make the best trade possible.

If the Secretary of the Treasury, with that power, should settle with our allies and take bonds bearing a greater rate of interest than the bonds sold to our people bear, we would be doing our allies a foul injustice, because we entered into a solemn contract with them, made by the Congress, when we told them, in the acts of 1917 and 1918, that we were going to lend them that money without discount on exactly the same terms on which we borrowed it from our own people.

On the other hand, if we were to take a lower rate of interest for this money, if we were to lend it to our allies now, five years after we did lend it, at a lower rate of interest and under more favorable terms than those on which we borrowed it from our own people, manifestly we would be violating the contract with our own people who bought our bonds.

Therefore there is but one honest, straight way to settle this controversy—the United States should live up to the contract made with our allies in 1917 and 1918 and take bonds under the terms of those acts, which is what my amendment provides for.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Assuming a somewhat Socratic method of question and answer. I understand the Senator thinks that our allies or associates should pay the interest which they owe us?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. So do I. The Senator thinks they should, as speedily as possible, pay the principal sums which they owe us?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not in cash. The acts of 1917 and 1918 provided that the Secretary of the Treasury take 20-year bonds for the principal, with rates of interest identically the same as we pay to the people who took our bonds.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. That is exactly what I meant to bring out by my question.

Mr. McKELLAR. None of the Secretaries of the Treasury have done that, and we simply have I O U's. In the meantime about a billion dollars of back interest has accrued. The present Secretary of the Treasury says that under the law of 1917 and 1918 he has no authority to do anything but to collect the accrued interest, and that to collect it in cash now would be a great hardship. I am inclined to think he is right about that, and therefore this amendment provides that he shall take for the interest already due, or which will accrue up to January 1, 1922, the same class of bonds he takes for the principal debt. In other words, in this amendment we treat the entire indebtedness, including the interest up to January 1, 1922, as a principal indebtedness and take bonds for it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. In lieu of cash?

Mr. McKELLAR. In lieu of the I. O. U's.; and then on and after January 1, 1922, they will begin to pay the interest coupons on the bonds. It seems to me so plain, it is so honest to all our allies, and so honest to our own people, that I can hardly understand how any Senator could vote against it. That is the way I feel about it.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Agreeing with the Senator in very much he has said, I think our allies and associates should be honest with us.

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator; and not only that, but we must force them to be honest and just with us.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Precisely.

Mr. McKELLAR. But I have great confidence in our allies. I believe that if this amendment were to be put on this bill, and become the law in the next 30 days, there would not be a country which had formerly been associated with us that would not send its bonds to us by the 1st day of January, if the Secretary of the Treasury were to ask it.

When I say that, I have in mind the conditions in Russia. Russia owes us relatively very little money. Of course, it is an enormous sum in one sense, but as compared with this enormous debt it is very, very small. But Russia would be willing to give us her bonds and pay the interest on them. She would be delighted to do it. She has been begging to be allowed to do that, if newspaper accounts are correct. But they would all do it, and there would be no further trouble about it, if the American Congress would stop printing propaganda about cancellation, and merely ask those nations to give us the bonds, and to begin paying the interest on the 1st of January, 1922.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I have gathered, from the remarks of the Senator, that he is opposed to the proposition of vesting in the Secretary of the Treasury full plenary power to adjust the debts.

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes; and if the Senator will allow me to make a statement, I will tell him why.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I did not mean to interrupt or to divert the Senator's thoughts, or to do more than develop his view, if he cared to express it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will be very glad to express it. I have never had an opinion I was not willing to express when called upon, and when I believed it ought to be expressed.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator would not be willing to vest full plenary power in the Secretary of the Treasury, out of considerations which to his mind seem good and sufficient, would he be willing to vest the power in a commission made up, perhaps, of the Secretary of the Treasury and two or four reputable, competent Americans, Democrats or Republicans—for I forget politics in this matter——

Mr. McKELLAR. Political views are wholly immaterial in the consideration of this subject.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The Senator would be willing, would he not, to vest the power in such a commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I would not.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. If the Senator is not willing to vest the power to negotiate on behalf of our country and adjust these matters, obtaining the bonds which he hopes we will receive, to whom would he delegate the power? Who would negotiate? Who would represent our country in and about the matter in hand?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, if the Senator had been a Member of this body in 1917 and 1918, and had taken part in the debates and the framing of the two acts of 1917 and 1918 under which this money referred to was loaned, he would not ask that question, except probably in a modified way. Let me explain the matter to the Senator.

The acts of 1917 and 1918, under which that money was loaned, authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to carry out the terms of the acts, and those terms are very simple. They directed him to receive from our associates or allies bonds of like tenor and effect, carrying a like rate of interest, with the bonds which we sold to our own people, and with the same date of maturity.

I will tell the Senator why I am unwilling to give plenary power to the Secretary of the Treasury to deal with them as he desires, taking one class of bonds, one nation's bonds, or another nation's bonds, or any other kind of a bond he pleases. The Senator from California has asked me a question which I think is very important, and I want to answer it.

I am opposed to giving that full plenary power to deal with this matter in any way to the Secretary of the Treasury or to a commission, and I will state the reason. I am frank to say that I happen to know the present Secretary of the Treasury, and I would just as soon trust him to handle it as any commission. I do not think it makes a particle of difference to whom you give the plenary power; it would be just the same. It is equally objectionable.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The law is not self-executing; some human mind must attend to it.

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly; and the law provides that the Secretary of the Treasury shall carry out the terms imposed by Congress. The reason why I would not give the Secretary plenary power is this: That if you give him the power, or give a commission the power, to make a better contract than the law of 1917 and 1918 provided—there were two acts, but it was the same law—you would violate the contract with the Allies. On the other hand, if the Secretary should make a less favorable agreement with them, and take a lower rate of interest or a less desirable bond, we would authorize him to violate our agreement with our own people; because we solemnly pledged the American people, when we borrowed the money from them to be loaned to our allies, that we would lend it to the Allies on precisely the same terms as those on which we borrowed it from our own people.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. What about the interest now due?

Mr. McKELLAR. The question of the interest is subject to the same explanation.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. How is it to be paid?

Mr. McKELLAR. In exactly the same way.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I contend it ought to be paid in money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course it is to be paid in money eventually.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. And not in bonds?

Mr. McKELLAR. That is what the agreement provides, that it shall be paid in money. The interest on the allied bonds is required to be paid in money. That is the situation.

That is all I care to say about it. It is a business transaction which ought to be handled in a business way. It would be a piece of utter maudlin sentimentality if we intrusted any one man or any commission to make any trade of any kind about these foreign loans other than the contract we have already made, and I hope the amendment I have offered will be agreed to. It is the best way to settle the indebtedness. It is the best way to pay the soldiers. It is the best way to save the taxpayers of the United States.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-six Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, probably out of 96 Senators there are not half a dozen who will not vote for a soldiers' compensation bill and, in my opinion, when the time comes, for the soldiers' compensation bill practically as reported by the Committee on Finance and as formulated into the amendments which have been offered and read to the Senate.

In reporting that bill, I wrote the report and made it on behalf of the committee. I followed that immediately by a quite lengthy address explaining the bill, explaining its justice and fairness, and speaking as earnestly and strongly in its favor as I could. In all of that long discussion I never once alluded to anything that had the slightest partisan tinge. I regarded it as an American proposition and discussed it as such, and when it was referred back to the committee it was a great disappointment to me. I accepted the condition as it was and at that time made a statement as to what I believed would be the final outcome, namely, that it would delay for some months its enactment, but that it would be enacted into law by the American Congress, not a Republican or a Democratic Congress, but by the American Congress, in sufficient time to make the bill as it was then drawn applicable with reference to the beginning of the payments. I have not changed my mind in that respect. I am certain that result will still follow.

Mr. President, two amendments have been offered to the revenue bill, one seeking to engraft upon it the rejected excess-profits tax to which is hitched the soldiers' compensation bill, which was favorably reported in the early part of the session, and the other seeking to engraft upon it the soldiers' compensation bill to which is hitched an innocuous proviso for its payment out of a fund which in all probability will not materialize until a law has been enacted for its adjustment and collection.

It makes little difference, Mr. President, whether the soldiers' compensation bill is attached to the excess-profits provision for the purpose of reinstating that principle of taxation, or whether the excess-profits provision is attached to the soldiers' compensation bill for the purpose of enacting that measure. Its impropriety upon a revenue bill is apparent in each case. Let us remember that this is a revenue bill pure and simple, a bill to raise money to meet the appropriations of Congress. It is not a bill for general legislation. No character of a rider ought to be put upon a revenue bill. It is a bill that is to be enforced by rules and regulations of the Treasury Department. Its provisions ought not to be entangled with other provisions that are to be enforced by an entirely different department of Government and for an entirely different purpose.

Mr. President, the soldiers' compensation bill was reported favorably by the Finance Committee during this session. After a very vigorous protest on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury, followed by an oral message delivered by the President to the Senate, it was referred back to the Committee on Finance. Both the Secretary of the Treasury and the President presented the depressed industrial condition of the country and the danger to the Treasury and asked for its postponement. While I could not vote with the majority, the bill was referred back to the Committee on Finance, as everyone knows, for the purpose only of postponing action on it. It is now proposed to attach this soldiers' compensation bill to the revenue bill.

Mr. President, I think everyone will concede the natural impropriety of attaching to a bill the sole purpose of which is to raise revenue an amendment which is to expend revenue. That the compensation bill does not belong to a revenue measure goes without saying. Attached, however, as I am to the righteousness of the soldiers' compensation bill, I think I could waive that objection, serious as it is, if I felt at all assured that by so doing it would advance the compensation bill into law. But I am certain that no such result would follow, and I am earnestly opposed to any effort to make the soldiers' compensation bill a political football to be kicked about in the Senate of the United States in a mere political game between the two sides of this Chamber.

Mr. President, the World War was fought to a finish by the American Nation as a unit and not by either or any political party. The American Nation as a unit has paid the penalty in blood and will continue to pay in treasure to meet the enormous national obligations imposed by reason of the war. The American Senate should consider the soldiers' compensation bill as an all-around American measure, and of all measures in the world it ought not to be used for the purpose of obtaining or attempting to obtain some partisan advantage.

It is well known and conceded that the revenue bill is framed to raise, in connection with the tariff and other sources of income, just barely enough revenue to meet the running expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year. It will barely cover, even if it does that, the obligations evidenced by appropriations and other national obligations which will mature during the fiscal year.

Recognizing this fact, one of these amendments seeks to meet the difficulty by reinstating the excess-profits tax, which, of course, must be in addition to the flat corporation income tax and the capital-stock tax already imposed by this bill upon corporations.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I inquire to what fiscal year the Senator is referring? The Senator said this bill will provide just enough revenue to provide for the necessary expenses, and so forth, of the fiscal year.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the fiscal year to which it is supposed to apply, and that would be the fiscal year that takes in the last half of the next calendar year and the first half of the following year, of course. That is what I have reference to.

Mr. President, would it be possible to reinstate the excess-profits tax into this bill and have it become an effective law? Can we give life to that which is regarded by the administration and by a decisive majority of both branches of Congress as an obnoxious proposition by tying it to a most righteous proposition? I know it can not be done, and, Mr. President, I have too much regard for the soldiers' compensation bill to vote to tie it to a corpse.

The overwhelming majority of the Members of this Senate favor the soldiers' compensation bill as it was reported to the Senate. A very decided majority of the Senate are opposed to the excess-profits tax, and you can not materially reduce that decided majority against the excess-profits tax by attempting to sweeten it with the soldiers' compensation bill. The soldiers' compensation bill will be passed independently of the fate of the excess-profits tax.

Mr. President, that part of the Republican platform which declared against a tax which "needlessly represses enterprise and thrift" was construed by the President in his speeches as imposing upon the administration a mandate to do away with the excess-profits tax. Leading Republicans in all their campaign speeches declared that the policy of the administration would be against the excess-profits tax, and that policy has been carried out by the votes of both Houses by very decided majorities.

I am not one of those who claim that the vast Republican majority in the last campaign was due to this plank or to any other particular plank in the platform. It was due principally to the dissatisfaction with the awful extravagances, the mismanagement, the inefficiency, and the paternalistic tendencies of the previous administration. Nevertheless, there was so much stress laid upon the question of the excess-profits tax as a deterrent to renewed industrial activity and consequent prosperity that it is my opinion the American people expect a repeal of that tax. By a very decisive vote of both branches of Congress this Congress has declared against its continuance. There has been substituted for it an increased flat tax on corporate income and a tax on capital stock. I am absolutely certain that the soldiers' compensation bill could not be attached to this defunct excess-profits tax, placed as a rider on the pending revenue bill, and carried through both branches of Congress.

But, Mr. President, even if that were possible, we would still have the third branch of the law-making power to deal with, and I can not see how it would be possible, after the earnest plea which the President made to defer action on the adjusted compensation bill, for him to do anything but refuse to indorse the revenue bill with such an amendment. If he regarded the immediate enactment of the soldiers' compensation bill as so serious as to require his special plea to the Senate of the United States for time, what must be his attitude if we not only bring it forward again in another bill, but in addition make it far less acceptable by attaching to it an additional method of taxation which he, his administration, and both branches of Congress have condemned?

Attaching the soldiers' compensation bill to this bill would be but playing with it; and to cloud it with a defeat at this time would defer, if not jeopardize, its final enactment into law. For that reason I shall refuse to give a vote to attach it to the revenue bill in any form.

But, Mr. President, the way is open to the Senate to speedily provide means by which the soldiers' compensation bill can be enacted into law, and that without the necessity, in my opinion, of providing any further taxes whatever to take care of it. A bill has passed the House and is before the Senate now which will authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust and fund the foreign obligations due this country, to the end that we may begin to obtain interest on them. We have had such a bill before the Committee on Finance and before the Senate for a long time. It has been needlessly, and, I think, purposely delayed. Because it may not be satisfactory to every Senator is no reasonable excuse why it should not have been acted upon long ago. If a majority of the Senate want to amend it, let them do so. Then let us pass it, so that the Secretary of the Treasury may proceed to settle these foreign loans. Let us begin to get our interest out of them.

This method of reaching the difficulty was clearly indicated in the President's message. When the President appealed to the Senate for time before enacting the soldiers' compensation law, he said:

After a survey of more than four months, contemplating conditions which would stagger all of us were it not for our abiding faith in America, I am fully persuaded that three things are essential to the very beginning of the restored order of things. These are the revision, including reduction, of our internal taxation, the refunding of our war debt, and the adjustment of our foreign loans. It is vitally necessary to settle these problems before adding to our Treasury any such burden as is contemplated in the pending bill—

Which was the soldiers' compensation bill.

Mr. President, the revision spoken of will be completed in at least a few weeks. The refunding of the war debt has been and will be met as the obligations mature. There is still left of the three propositions only the adjustment of our foreign loans. On that adjustment, in my opinion, at present at least, hangs the fate of the soldiers' compensation bill. The President's objection clearly indicates that when that is settled the extra burden upon the Treasury imposed by the soldiers' compensation act can be met.

Further on in his address he says that this enactment now would add seriously to our interest rate, clearly intimating that with the funding of our war debt completed it could be enacted into law. Taking his address as a whole, it is very clear that that the President has been relying upon the funding of our foreign loans to secure the cash to meet the soldiers' compensation requirements.

In accordance with that suggestion there was prepared and submitted a bill for adjusting and funding our foreign credits.

I took an earnest interest in that bill because I wanted to secure its enactment in the shortest possible time, so that we could meet the objections of the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. That bill should have been passed two months ago, and if so passed, we could have secured the settlement of our loans, at least with the three great powers, by January 1, 1922.

The Secretary of the Treasury needs the authority of Congress properly to settle these foreign loans. His present authority goes no further than to enable him to accept bonds comparable in interest and time of payment with the bonds which we issued to secure the loans which we made to foreign Governments. Beyond that his hands are tied. Give him that authority and give it to him immediately. Hedge that authority about with any restrictions which may be thought necessary, but let us start the machinery of settlement into immediate operation and proceed on the way toward the final enactment of this soldiers' legislation. The interest on our foreign obligations will far more than take care of any sum that may be required to meet the draft entailed upon the Treasury.

But it is insisted that the Secretary of the Treasury has ample power to fund these foreign credits. He has not the authority to make such arrangements for time and interest rates which present world conditions require.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Do I understand the Senator from North Dakota is willing that there shall be passed some such measure as that proposed by the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not as I understand the measure which has been proposed by the Senator from Tennessee, and I will give my reason for that position in a moment, if the Senator will allow me.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. May I ask the Senator a further question relating to something previously referred to by him? Do I understand the Senator to contend that if we were to adopt the bonus amendment the bill would then be vetoed by the President of the United States?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not for me to say what the President of the United States would do. He has the power of veto, of course. I have never discussed the subject with him. I simply know how earnestly he opposed the project of the adjusted compensation bill at the time it was before the Senate and the reasons urged for his opposition. It is not a question whether I agreed with those reasons or did not agree with them; they were his reasons and the reasons of the Secretary of the Treasury. As I have stated, if he pleaded so earnestly for a delay at that time, what must be his attitude if, in addition to that provision, without any other change in conditions, a provision be now adopted that will reinstate in the proposed revenue law a tax which his administration, his Treasury, and both branches of the Congress have condemned? Whether or not he would veto such legislation would, of course, be for the President to decide.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, my question was whether the Senator from North Dakota believed that the President would veto the bill. I asked the question because in the statement which the Senator from North Dakota has been making he has referred to the efforts of the President to have the bill recommitted when it was before the Senate. It appeared to me that there could be no point to the argument of the Senator from North Dakota unless it was that if the Congress should pass this bill with the bonus amendment the President would veto it. So I would like to inquire what the opinion of the Senator from North Dakota is in that respect?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I decline to give an opinion. I can see the danger, and I have pointed out the danger, and any Senator can survey the situation and draw such conclusions as he thinks would be justified; but we are not driven to that position.

Mr. President, it must be remembered that the situation of our debtors—and I am coming right now to the matter discussed by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]—is far more serious than ours. In law every one of them is bankrupt. Not one of them could meet its debts, either to us or to its allies, or even the interest on them, if they were all demanded at one time. They could not raise the money by taxation nor borrow the stupendous sums necessary. We are not going to war against any one of them to force the payment of interest or of principal. We could not collect even if we should make war. We can not extract blood from a stone simply by hammering it the more. We must so arrange with each nation that it can meet its obligations not only to us, but to each one of its other creditors; and here, Mr. President, arises a difficulty that the Senator from Tennessee and others who have discussed that matter do not seem fully to realize, the necessity of treating with all or at least the greater nations in combination.

Great Britain, for instance, borrowed from us about four and a half billions of dollars. She loaned to her allies, who were our allies also, every cent she borrowed from us. In addition to lending to Great Britain, we loaned heavily to France and Italy, and less heavily to other countries engaged in the struggle; but Great Britain, France, and Italy are the principal nations we have to deal with. We shall not, of course, take the obligations of one country for the obligations of another, especially of these important countries; but, Mr. President, we can not lose sight of the fact that each one of our debtors is dependent upon the others. We loaned the greater sum to Great Britain, and allowed Great Britain to reloan it to countries which were far less able to pay.

I saw an estimate of the British exchequer some time ago to the effect that they could not expect to recover more than 46 per cent of what Great Britain loaned to her allies. We expect to collect at least 95 per cent of what we loaned. Suppose we now ask Great Britain to pay us interest on her debt. She turns to France and asks that country to pay interest on her debt in order that Great Britain may pay the United States. France turns to Italy and asks for interest on advances made to her. Now, while at a first glance we might say, "Let each of these countries settle its own debt and arrange for its own time; we have nothing to do with them," we find on second thought that we have something to do with these questions. What we want is our money, or our interest on that money. If it is conceded that France can not pay Great Britain in cash, she must give her bonds bearing interest, and these bonds, by reason of her distressed situation, may be postponed in their payment for 75 or 100 years. We demand of Great Britain that she pay her debt in 25 or 30 years. She would, therefore, be forced to say to France: "Inasmuch as the United States will not grant a credit of more than 30 years, we can not grant a credit of more than 30 years to you." So, you see, we shall have to negotiate with all of these countries, and these countries must negotiate with each other, and all arrive at a plan by which principal and interest can be paid. The only authority, as I now remember, which the Secretary of the Treasury would have in funding these obligations would be to make them due at the same time, and bear the same rate of interest, as the American obligations, and without any authority for the funding of the past-due interest into long-time obligations.

Then, again, the United States may demand a certain rate of interest. Great Britain might demand of France a smaller or a greater rate of interest. So the question of interest and how it is to be paid becomes an important feature that all of these countries should agree to among themselves. Their differences must be composed, in order that each one may secure payment at the earliest possible time.

Again, this matter of interest becomes important in another respect. Interest for several years has already accumulated on the indebtedness of these countries. How will we handle that interest? As stated, I do not think that under the present law of Congress we could fund the interest into long-time bonds, and this authority must be given by Congress to the Secretary.

What, then, will we do with this accumulated interest? Leave it in its present status and collect it as we can or fund it into long-time obligations, or absorb it into the higher interest on the bonds representing the principal? In other words, would it be better to convert this interest into long-time bonds, bearing the usual rate of interest, or would it be better to insert a higher rate of interest in the principal bonds—a rate sufficiently high to take care of the accrued interest, say, in 10 or 20 years?

There is one decided advantage in the latter proposition. If the Government should become short of funds at any time, either to meet the requirements of the soldiers' compensation bill or for any other reason, the bonds bearing this higher rate of interest could be more easily and surely converted into cash by sale in the open market; but this could not be done, in my opinion, without further legislation.
